However, it wasn't only Bernstein's weekend triumph. Music director, William Steinberg, more refreshed and unusally active, since the previous weekend also drew an overwhelming large attendance of 12,359 for Saturday's concert, which included invigorating performances of the third and seventh symphonies, and Kind Stephan Overture. Friday evening he conduted the third Leonore overture, a vibrant reading of the fifthsymphony and, with Iztak Perlman's masterful interpretation, the Dmajor violin concerto. The almost 10,000 attendance was a record number in the festival's history!

This weekend's concerts include: Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Friday program of Copland, Ruggles,Stravinsky and Tschaikovsky; Saturday, Ozawa, and the Haydn Symphony No. 96, the third Prokofiev piano concerto with Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's Cassiopeia with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta; Sunday Daniel Barenboim directing Schubert's Rosamund overture, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole with violinist Pinchas Zukerman, and Tschaikovsky's fourth symphony.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

AUG 8 1971

New England Newsclip

Bernstein's Missa at Tanglewood

BY RICHARD BUELL

A mere traversal of the circumference of Beethoven's great Missa Solemnis is an exhausting experience, and one infrequently undertaken by performers and audiences. Where the Ninth Symphony, from the same period, can be seen as a large-scale drama in four sharply characterized acts, this awesome but unlovable monolith admits of no such easy view. It is not popular. The Missa is introspective Beethoven of the late period, employing means of the utmost concentration and melodic austerity, and calling for large performing forces on whom great, and at times impossible, demands are made. A more knotty and problematical work could not have been chosen as homage to Serge Koussevitsky, but Leonard Bernstein's account of it last Sunday was impressive and exciting in ways that the Berkshire Festival's late founder would have valued highly.

That's some spicy scherzo.

A concern for quality of sound and the ability to generate physical excitement were a large part of Koussevitsky's sway over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-five years; the mature Leonard Bernstein of late has added to these a long-spanned intellectual grasp of large musical problems that is his own. The adjective may seem bizarre, but there was something almost Germanic about the kind of steadiness and weightiness of exposition in his conducting of the Missa, an uncelebrated quality he brought to his readings of the Ninth Symphony with this orchestra last year. (This is not to say that he is to audiences any less the highly visible and rhythmic mediator of music than he has always been. The Lenny-watchers at Tanglewood were not disappointed.)

The physical energy was as expected, but it was in the service of a nicely graded scheme of tempos, particularly in the eventful and crowded landscape of the "Credo." There was nothing jagged or hyperthyroid about the excitement of the Gloria's presto conclusion or the rather wild melismatic sections of the "Credo." And the "Sanctus" had a quality of repose that was neither post-exhaustion nor immobile. The singing of the chorus had a balanced massiveness that made a very visceral impact in its continent and orderly way. High marks to John Oliver, who prepared them. The orchestral playing was incisive, especially in the strings, and there was some noble woodwind playing from Wright and Dwyer. The few crudenesses I noticed were in the vibrato department: the rather standardized expressivity of Joseph Silverstein's violin solos, and some epicene crooning from the principal trombone.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 26 1971

Tanglewood Concert Salutes Beethoven

By LAURIE MODELL

In a year filled with his music, it is well-nigh impossible to say anything fresh or original about Beethoven.

* * *

His works have been played ad infinitum on the radio; made into hit rock songs; and his name has been emblazoned across sweat shirts, along with statues, cartoons and other interesting attempts to make an already permanent fixture in western culture more permanent. However, for most people, what the year hasn't been filled with is live performances (emphasis on the word 'live') with conductors evoking energy and excitement from his music and musicians playing him with dedication.

It [illegible] that Beethoven has become almost a cliche, for the freshness and genius of his works was never more apparent than at Tanglewood Friday night, when William Steinberg and guest violinist Itzakh Perlman gave listeners a truly thrilling evening in performances of the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Violin Concerto and the Fifth Symphony.

* * *

Itzak Perlman, in a memorable performance of the Violin Concerto, played with a loving warmth and romanticism that gave one a feeling at times of listening in a small room with a few friends, so personal was his interpretation. His cadenzas in particular were technically perfect, but for once this fact was almost obscured by the overall line and continuity. Even when he wasn't playing, there was the sensation of his holding the threads of the musical ideas together.

In Friday's performance of Beethoven's Fifth, it was interesting to observe Mr. Steinberg's emphasis on the various aspects of this familiar work. He gave particular attention to brass punctuation of the fortissimo sections, especially noticeable in the opening section of the third movement and almost domineering in the beginning of the fourth. Mr. Steinberg also has an unusual ear for the often-neglected sub-themes in the woodwind parts.

It is always treading on dangerous ground to speak of programmatic aspects (what the composer was "really" driving at) in music that was not originally provided with a program; however it is safe to say that the Fifth Symphony is a fascinating study of mood changes, from the opening stormy anger and foreboding to the final spirit of triumph. As a matter of fact, this energy seems almost unbearably affirmative—Beethoven concludes the work by repeatedly hammering at a C major chord until the listener wants to scream or burst out laughing. Mr. Steinberg, sensing this difficulty, brought the work to a fast furious close, scarcely allowing the audience time to become oppressed by that unending cadence.

The orchestra also played Beethoven's last overture to his only opera Fidelio, the Leonore Overture No. 3 which, while containing none of the melodies of "Fidelio," embodies the spirit of the opera, that of good triumphing over evil, in a tremendously driving and energetic manner. Particularly outstanding in this work was Doriot Anthony Dwyer's incredible flute passagework and, as always under William Steinberg, the brass was given special emphasis throughout.

Friday evening's Weekend Prelude presented Sherrill Milnes, baritone, in a recital of songs and arias by Handel, Mozart, Wolf, Marx, Mussorsgky and Tchaikovsky. Accompanied with great skill and taste by Jon Spong, Mr. Milnes displayed a rich dark tone quality and a fine dramatic sense. This was especially evident in his encores from Gounod's "Faust" and Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and in the American folk song, Shenendoah.

Beethoven Concerts Draw Record Crowds

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — There were several brands of excitement at the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend of Beethoven concerts that brought record audiences of 38,186 to Tanglewood.

It was reported to be the largest weekend box-office returns in the 34 years of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Another statistical record-breaker was the largest Friday night audience — 9,015 — in Tanglewood history.

Beethoven's music would seem to remain the biggest draw in the concert field.

Some might assume that it was Leonard Bernstein's appearance yesterday afternoon conducting the Boston Symphony. Saturday night, despite threats of bad weather, William Steinberg's appearance drew only 183 fewer persons than yesterday's 12,542.

Musical Coup

While the audience didn't respond as noisily as yesterday, the weekend's musical "coup" was Steinbergs' conducting of the third and seventh symphonies Saturday night.

The man even brought a kind of unaccustomed stature to the "King Stephen" Overture which is several notches below Beethoven's best work.

As expected, the audience salvoed Bernstein's superman podium tactics with the "Missa Solemnis." He had all the Festival Chorus and Choir of some 150 voices, and capable soloists.

Changes in programming usually bring groans, but there was much applause when it was announced that Phyllis Curtin and Maureen Forrester were last minute substitutions for Arlene Saunders and Florence Kopleff, both indisposed. The tenor was William Cochran, and the bass, Sherrill Milnes.

Koussevitzky Tribute

"Missa Solemnis" was performed in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, founder of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center, and for 25 years conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Historians and theologians may dispute Beethoven's incentives in writing it, but the work remains powerful, passionate, and radiant.

Behind Bernstein's melodramatics, it required no more than the eye and ear to be constantly aware of a marvelous display of musicianship, as well as showmanship.

There was a score in front of him but he seemed to turn a few dozen pages at the time and ignore it.

The chorus gave him perfectly formed chorda blocks, fugues in the Gloria and Credo that were sung with steel-like security, and beautifully mellowed, ringing, resonant sound in fervent passages.

John Oliver should share the credit. He prepared the chorus.

Soloists Commended

The soloists acquitted themselves well, with Miss Curtin in fourth position. She did have problems with pitch, but is to be admired for coping with Beethoven's heavy demands after little preparation.

Miss Forrester's marvelous alto voice was completely reliable. Cochran and Milnes sang with verve and musicality.

Bernstein saw to it that orchestral balances, plus organ, didn't stand in the way of words.

The great Gloria and parts of the Credo were all the more stirring in restrospect contrasted by the gentle beauty of the Sanctus and beautiful appeal for peace at the end.

Saturday night, Steinberg achieved superb results with far less physical effort than Bernstein and much musical perception.

The "King Stephen" introduction was tempered and poised. Glistening sound and dashing passagework stamped the main body of the work.

Powerful declamatory statements initiated an excellent reading of the Seventh Symphony. Steinberg drew an inseparable relationship between fragile phrases, heavy punctuation and exuberant melody.

Notably in the allegretto, dynamics were widespread from whispers to shouts, over which a full-scale lament prevailed.

Heretical as it may sound, the "Eroica" or Third Symphony (Funeral March and Finale) can be a downright bore. This performance, under Steinberg, was a triumph.

Shifts from storm to serenity had exact boundaries. Form was completely lucid to the scholar. Strings were dazzling. Winds were purely-toned.

Steinberg slowed down the Funeral March to emphasize its sorrow, but nobility remained. Played at such a tempo by a lesser orchestra, the March would have died on the vine or fallen apart.

The Scherzo broke loose at top speed without penalty. The Finale was all-bravura, not only in heavy oratory but quiet repartee.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 75,000

AUG 8 1971

New England Newsclip

Bernstein's Missa at Tanglewood

BY RICHARD BUELL

A mere traversal of the circumference of Beethoven's great Missa Solemnis is an exhausting experience, and one infrequently undertaken by performers and audiences. Where the Ninth Symphony, from the same period, can be seen as a large-scale drama in four sharply characterized acts, this awesome but unlovable monolith admits of no such easy view. It is not popular. The Missa is introspective Beethoven of the late period, employing means of the utmost concentration and melodic austerity, and calling for large performing forces on whom great, and at times impossible, demands are made. A more knotty and problematical work could not have been chosen as homage to Serge Koussevitsky, but Leonard Bernstein's account of it last Sunday was impressive and exciting in ways that the Berkshire Festival's late founder would have valued highly.

That's some spicy scherzo.

A concern for quality of sound and the ability to generate physical excitement were a large part of Koussevitsky's sway over the Boston Symphony Orchestra for twenty-five years; the mature Leonard Bernstein of late has added to these a long-spanned intellectual grasp of large musical problems that is his own. The adjective may seem bizarre, but there was something almost Germanic about the kind of steadiness and weightiness of exposition in his conducting of the Missa, an uncelebrated quality he brought to his readings of the Ninth Symphony with this orchestra last year. (This is not to say that he is to audiences any less the highly visible and rhythmic mediator of music than he has always been. The Lenny-watchers at Tanglewood were not disappointed.)

The physical energy was as expected, but it was in the service of a nicely graded scheme of tempos, particularly in the eventful and crowded landscape of the "Credo." There was nothing jagged or hyperthyroid about the excitement of the Gloria's presto conclusion or the rather wild melismatic sections of the "Credo." And the "Sanctus" had a quality of repose that was neither post-exhaustion nor immobile. The singing of the chorus had a balanced massiveness that made a very visceral impact in its continent and orderly way. High marks to John Oliver, who prepared them. The orchestral playing was incisive, especially in the strings, and there was some noble woodwind playing from Wright and Dwyer. The few crudenesses I noticed were in the vibrato department: the rather standardized expressivity of Joseph Silverstein's violin solos, and some epicene crooning from the principal trombone.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 26 1971

Tanglewood Concert Salutes Beethoven

By LAURIE MODELL

In a year filled with his music, it is well-nigh impossible to say anything fresh or original about Beethoven.

* * *

His works have been played ad infinitum on the radio; made into hit rock songs; and his name has been emblazoned across sweat shirts, along with statues, cartoons and other interesting attempts to make an already permanent fixture in western culture more permanent. However, for most people, what the year hasn't been filled with is live performances (emphasis on the word 'live') with conductors evoking energy and excitement from his music and musicians playing him with dedication.

It [illegible] that Beethoven has become almost a cliche, for the freshness and genius of his works was never more apparent than at Tanglewood Friday night, when William Steinberg and guest violinist Itzakh Perlman gave listeners a truly thrilling evening in performances of the Leonore Overture No. 3, the Violin Concerto and the Fifth Symphony.

* * *

Itzak Perlman, in a memorable performance of the Violin Concerto, played with a loving warmth and romanticism that gave one a feeling at times of listening in a small room with a few friends, so personal was his interpretation. His cadenzas in particular were technically perfect, but for once this fact was almost obscured by the overall line and continuity. Even when he wasn't playing, there was the sensation of his holding the threads of the musical ideas together.

In Friday's performance of Beethoven's Fifth, it was interesting to observe Mr. Steinberg's emphasis on the various aspects of this familiar work. He gave particular attention to brass punctuation of the fortissimo sections, especially noticeable in the opening section of the third movement and almost domineering in the beginning of the fourth. Mr. Steinberg also has an unusual ear for the often-neglected sub-themes in the woodwind parts.

It is always treading on dangerous ground to speak of programmatic aspects (what the composer was "really" driving at) in music that was not originally provided with a program; however it is safe to say that the Fifth Symphony is a fascinating study of mood changes, from the opening stormy anger and foreboding to the final spirit of triumph. As a matter of fact, this energy seems almost unbearably affirmative—Beethoven concludes the work by repeatedly hammering at a C major chord until the listener wants to scream or burst out laughing. Mr. Steinberg, sensing this difficulty, brought the work to a fast furious close, scarcely allowing the audience time to become oppressed by that unending cadence.

The orchestra also played Beethoven's last overture to his only opera Fidelio, the Leonore Overture No. 3 which, while containing none of the melodies of "Fidelio," embodies the spirit of the opera, that of good triumphing over evil, in a tremendously driving and energetic manner. Particularly outstanding in this work was Doriot Anthony Dwyer's incredible flute passagework and, as always under William Steinberg, the brass was given special emphasis throughout.

Friday evening's Weekend Prelude presented Sherrill Milnes, baritone, in a recital of songs and arias by Handel, Mozart, Wolf, Marx, Mussorsgky and Tchaikovsky. Accompanied with great skill and taste by Jon Spong, Mr. Milnes displayed a rich dark tone quality and a fine dramatic sense. This was especially evident in his encores from Gounod's "Faust" and Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and in the American folk song, Shenendoah.

Beethoven Concerts Draw Record Crowds

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — There were several brands of excitement at the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend of Beethoven concerts that brought record audiences of 38,186 to Tanglewood.

It was reported to be the largest weekend box-office returns in the 34 years of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Another statistical record-breaker was the largest Friday night audience — 9,015 — in Tanglewood history.

Beethoven's music would seem to remain the biggest draw in the concert field.

Some might assume that it was Leonard Bernstein's appearance yesterday afternoon conducting the Boston Symphony. Saturday night, despite threats of bad weather, William Steinberg's appearance drew only 183 fewer persons than yesterday's 12,542.

Musical Coup

While the audience didn't respond as noisily as yesterday, the weekend's musical "coup" was Steinbergs' conducting of the third and seventh symphonies Saturday night.

The man even brought a kind of unaccustomed stature to the "King Stephen" Overture which is several notches below Beethoven's best work.

As expected, the audience salvoed Bernstein's superman podium tactics with the "Missa Solemnis." He had all the Festival Chorus and Choir of some 150 voices, and capable soloists.

Changes in programming usually bring groans, but there was much applause when it was announced that Phyllis Curtin and Maureen Forrester were last minute substitutions for Arlene Saunders and Florence Kopleff, both indisposed. The tenor was William Cochran, and the bass, Sherrill Milnes.

Koussevitzky Tribute

"Missa Solemnis" was performed in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, founder of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center, and for 25 years conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Historians and theologians may dispute Beethoven's incentives in writing it, but the work remains powerful, passionate, and radiant.

Behind Bernstein's melodramatics, it required no more than the eye and ear to be constantly aware of a marvelous display of musicianship, as well as showmanship.

There was a score in front of him but he seemed to turn a few dozen pages at the time and ignore it.

The chorus gave him perfectly formed chorda blocks, fugues in the Gloria and Credo that were sung with steel-like security, and beautifully mellowed, ringing, resonant sound in fervent passages.

John Oliver should share the credit. He prepared the chorus.

Soloists Commended

The soloists acquitted themselves well, with Miss Curtin in fourth position. She did have problems with pitch, but is to be admired for coping with Beethoven's heavy demands after little preparation.

Miss Forrester's marvelous alto voice was completely reliable. Cochran and Milnes sang with verve and musicality.

Bernstein saw to it that orchestral balances, plus organ, didn't stand in the way of words.

The great Gloria and parts of the Credo were all the more stirring in restrospect contrasted by the gentle beauty of the Sanctus and beautiful appeal for peace at the end.

Saturday night, Steinberg achieved superb results with far less physical effort than Bernstein and much musical perception.

The "King Stephen" introduction was tempered and poised. Glistening sound and dashing passagework stamped the main body of the work.

Powerful declamatory statements initiated an excellent reading of the Seventh Symphony. Steinberg drew an inseparable relationship between fragile phrases, heavy punctuation and exuberant melody.

Notably in the allegretto, dynamics were widespread from whispers to shouts, over which a full-scale lament prevailed.

Heretical as it may sound, the "Eroica" or Third Symphony (Funeral March and Finale) can be a downright bore. This performance, under Steinberg, was a triumph.

Shifts from storm to serenity had exact boundaries. Form was completely lucid to the scholar. Strings were dazzling. Winds were purely-toned.

Steinberg slowed down the Funeral March to emphasize its sorrow, but nobility remained. Played at such a tempo by a lesser orchestra, the March would have died on the vine or fallen apart.

The Scherzo broke loose at top speed without penalty. The Finale was all-bravura, not only in heavy oratory but quiet repartee.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

AUG 12 1971

Memorials and festivals

Serge Koussevitzky's lasting memorial is actually the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where musical talents are nurtured and, it is hoped, stimulated by teaching, rehearsal, and performance. But the commemorative aspect usually is given a focus each summer by a particular Berkshire Festival concert. This summer it happened on July 25, when Leonard Bernstein, once a conducting pupil at Tanglewood, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four soloists, and a chorus in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

It was a huge, very near exhaustive performance. And considering the afternoon's super-humidity, it must have been exhausting to the participants. Perfect it wasn't. The chorus, combining two similarly named forces, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, sang sometimes a bit thickly, and there was some of that high-note strain that is often a built-in hazard with this music. But the performance was awesomely intense and sustained in Beethoven's prodigious vision. The beginning of the "Gloria" erupted like a zealous volcano, and Joseph Silverstein's violin solo in the "Benedictus," accompanied ethereally by two flutes, went splendidly. Most breathtaking of all were the gently billowing dynamics on "Dona nobis pacem" at the conclusion.

As 11th-hour replacements, soprano Phyllis Curtin and contralto Maureen Forrester poured out a lot of vibrant song, and tenor William Cochran contributed some semi-heroic sound. Baritone Sherrill Milnes, taking a role usually given to basses, seemed overmatched by the music.

But the total sum of the performance was what counted, and it was very great.

AUGUST HEAT in New York has been bringing with it for the last several years either Mozart or Mostly Mozart Festivals at super-air-conditioned Philharmonic Hall. This summer's go-round at Wolfgang Amadeus, relieved occasionally by Haydn and Schubert, began August 2 with a fine free-lance group named for the month the New York Chamber Orchestra and conducted, for this program only, by the Baltimore Symphony's upcoming musical director from Rumania, Sergiu Comissiona.

Conductor and orchestra started off with a crisp, lively, and often elegant reading of Haydn's Symphony No. 83, named "The Hen" because of a faintly persistent clucking motif in the first movement. Following this came Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 17 in G, with Alfred Brendel playing the keyboard part in a dynamically small-dimensioned but beautifully phrased performance. The pianist's tonal control and articulation, given his interpretive purposes, were masterly, making the interpretation itself all the more convincing to me.

The other soloist of the evening was soprano Benita Valente, singing two Mozart arias—"Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from the unfinished early opera, "Zaide," and the famous and technically difficult-to-sustain "Vorrei spiegarvi, oh Dio!" which has long outlived the Pasquale Anfossi opera into which it had been inserted. Miss Valente, who introduced the swoon-inciting melodic line of "Ruhe sanft" to most of us at the instigation of Boris Goldovsky at a Mozart Festival concert in the same hall a few summers ago, sang most of it last week with a remarkably luminous tone quality, but the highest notes —not really all that high, they are actually around A—were still giving her some trouble, and the considerable emotional content of the aria was barely hinted at. The other aria also needed more vocal acting and a better sustained line.

On August 5, the festival put on a program made up of numbers from several Mozart operas, most of them familiar. Eve Queler conducted with almost prevailing efficiency and looked like a brunette Tuesday Weld. The less familiar items included the numbers from "Lucio Silla;" the great trio, "Pria di partir" from "Idomeneo;" two pieces from "La Clemenza di Tito;" and "L'Amero, saro costante" from

Continued on next page

music

Continued from preceding page

"Il Re pastore."

Of the soloists, a Negro soprano named Jeannette Walters proved herself a genuine find, negotiating the awesome rondo, "Per Pieta" from "Cosi fan tutte" with a secure technique and solidly supported tone over that aria's uncommonly wide range.

Nadia Witkowska also made a striking impression with her lovely handling of the number from "Il Re pastore," and lively music and characterization came from Nancy Shade, Gary Glaze, Robert Paul, and Will Roy.

One curious thing about the program was the fact that the more familiar music, except for "Don Giovanni" excerpts, was sung in the standard Ruth and Thomas Martin English translations while the unusual things were kept in the original Italian. Was it because the singers only knew the standard stuff in their English versions and were too lazy to learn the originals, or was it because the time or money could not be spent to translate the rarer material into English? Does this kind of expediency have a place in a partly subsidized music festival?

One other gripe. Dr. William Ober's program notes for the operatic evening betrayed a spectacular innocence about what goes on in some of Mozart's operas. For instance, good doctor, Papageno plays the pipes, not a flute, before his interrupted suicide. Tamino does not find Pamina's picture immediately on reviving from his fainting spell. Fiordiligi's actual lover is Guglielmo, not Ferrando. As Alice Ghostley once howled so memorably in a Broadway-revue parody of Arthur Miller—"Pay attention!"

IN THE NEXT FEW WEEKS, I'm going to try to include in this column, besides current musical events as they come along, a recap by installments of the unusually full 1970-1971 season. There is a danger of small events getting lost among the big ones and of promising new music getting knocked by the wayside in discussions of old and new masterpieces. I'll try to be careful.

ONE OF THESE small events concerned a promising composer who is still a student, but whose work is beginning to be noticed. I didn't get to a Carnegie Recital Hall devoted entirely to the works of Patricia Del Re, but I did hear a tape of the program. Her compositional vocabulary was still small at the time of the concert, but already, especially in writing for the violin, there was evidence of a real gift for realizing what instruments can do and what makes them sing. Vocabulary comes with training and instruction. What I heard of Mrs. Del Re's music indicated the presence of something special that can never be taught.

—Leighton Kerner

Bernstein conducts Beethoven piece

'Missa Solemnis' at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The "Missa Solemnis" is Beethoven's greatest single achievement. A unique intersection of his grandest, most brilliant, public style and of that most private, uncompromisingly dense and complex style of his old age, it is surely the most searching interpretation to which any musician ever subjected the test of the Oridinary Mass, composed from out of a condition of spirit that afforded him limitless capacities for jubilation, terror, awe and serenity. A further marvel, and a very moving one, is how his fantasy, after years of deafness, continued to be so in touch with the physical reality of sound.

Because of its stupefying difficulties for conductor, singers, and players, and because, being difficult for listeners as well it is no means the guaranteed public success that the Ninth Symphony is, the "Missa Solemnis" is also the most rarely performed of Beethoven's major works. A good performance, then, is instantly a festival, and the performance which Leonard Bernstein conducted in memory of Serge Koussevitzky at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, at Tanglewood was, in fact, a superb one.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir were prepared by John Oliver. The soloists were Phyllic Curtin, soprano; Maureen Forrester, alto; William Cochran, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, bass, both women substituting at short notice for their indisposed colleagues Arleen Saunders and Florence Kopleff. Miss Curtin did not even have a chance to sing in the dress rehearsal Saturday morning.

Bernstein, in the right equilibrium of turned on and collected, is as able as any Beethoven conductor now working. He showed that when he conducted the Ninth in Boston in April of last year and again with the "Missa Solemnis" yesterday, this time in a situation far more challenging conceptually and technically.

It was exciting, rhythmic, perceptive of musical character, and, with all that, powerfully disciplined. There was the fury and fire of discovery about the performance — the "Missa" sounded as it should, like a new piece — and it was very clean, very straight. I had doubts only about two of the tempi, those for the "In Gloria Dei Patris" fugue and for "Pleni Sunt Coeli," which seemed fast, not so much for themselves as for the still greater speed with which Beethoven follows each, and a question also about that final, quiet, echoes-of-war kettle drum actions in the "Donna Nobis Pachem," which surely wants to be on B flat and not B natural.

The details of the performance were impressively filled in by all participants. The chorus was excellent, and the orchestra played with engagement, precision, and fine sound. The violin solo in the Benedictus was beautifully done by Joseph Silverstein, who has just the right sweetness and elegance for that extraordinary romance - become - sublime. The solo quartet, even with what I thought an excessive collective vibrato, was very good one and Miss Curtin's singing and especially Mr. Cochran's was very expressive and distinguished indeed.

The performance of the "Missa Solemnis" wound a up a whole weekend of Beethoven concerts, William Steinberg's programs ing included the Third, Fifth and Seventh symphonies, and the violin concerto (Itzhak Perlman).

Beethoven, who was nearly sued by one publisher as a result of his attempt to cheat six of them over the rights to his Mass, might have been pleased to know that his three concerts brought Tanglewood and attendance approaching 40,000 and the biggest box office income for a single weekend in its history.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

Bernstein at Tanglewood

Music Impresses Marlboro Group

By DONRAE W. HOGSETT
Telegram Marlboro Bureau

MARLBORO — "Well, I don't know much about his music, but I'll say one thing for him, he's got a lot of energy," Al Brigham reflected on the long drive back home.

"He hops around there like a grasshopper," he said.

Al thought he liked Beethoven but was really impressed with Leonard Bernstein. "He just didn't want to stand still."

Al was one of about 40 Marlboro residents who made the trip to Tanglewood yesterday to see Leonard Bernstein conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." The day's outing was sponsored by the Friends of the Public Library and the group made it out to Lennox by bus, leaving Marlboro shortly after 10 a.m.

Mostly Women

The group was made up mostly of women — they outnumbered the men about five to one — and they were all out to enjoy themselves.

Dressed informally but well, they carried lunches in picnic baskets and airline trip bags and boarded the bus behind the library shortly after 10 a.m.

Happy chatter filled the bus during most of the more than two-hour drive but with the air muggy, the air-conditioner in the bus not working and the journey growing tiring, the conversation died off a little towards the end.

Finally at Tanglewood, surrounded by green mountains and looking down on blue Lake Mankeenac, the group brightened as it got off the bus. Then it was down to the serious business of eating under the trees on the long green lawns.

The lunch menu was as varied as the people who made the trip. For some it was chicken salad sandwiches. For one woman of a more romantic bent, it was slicing a thick cheese, a loaf of French bread and sipping rose wine.

Lunch done, it was a quick trip through the gardens of Tanglewood and appreciation of the grounds.

Then into the music shed for the concert. When one woman found out where she was sitting, she balked a little at the location. "I feel like I'm sitting in Pittsfield," she said. "I think that's the stage way down there."

The woman's dispostiion wasn't helped any when a mod-haired young man sat in front of her, nearly eclipsing her view of the conductor.

The chatter kept up, even increased a little, as the group sat waiting for the concert. Waiting really for Bernstein.

It was all worth waiting for. Bernstein disappointed no one. As Al Brigham said, "He's got a lot of energy." More impressive than Bernstein, though, was the music.

Musician Impressed

"It was exciting, it really was," said Martha Yacyshn. As a musician, a pianist, she'd be the one to know. "It was just a wonderful concert. They all played so well."

She was particularly impressed by Bernstein's conducting — "He barely looked at the score all the way through," and by violin solo by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein — "He went through all of that without a flaw and he wasn't going by the score either."

The concert over, the Marlboro group joined the audience as it gave Bernstein, the orchestra, chorus and solists a long and exuberant standing ovation.

And then it was back on the bus and back to Marlboro. This time there was less conversation, a lot less energy. One woman leaned back in her seat and dozed. Another read a paper. Two woman cracked open another bottle of wine and enjoyed the day all the more.

And then they were all back home.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

Thousands Cheer Leonard Bernstein

By BARNET D. LASCHEVER
Sunday Editor

LENOX, Mass. — It would be nice to be able to say that a near record crowd of music lovers flocked to Tanglewood yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony play Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D."

They didn't. They jammed the giant music shed and spread themselves, blanket to blanket with their picnic hampers on the lawn to watch and cheer the now almost legendary conductor, Leonard Bernstein.

It was Bernstein's only appearance this year as director at Tanglewood and his fans came from all over. He had selected the seldom performed Beethoven to honor the great Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949, who died just 20 years ago.

Bernstein gave his mostly sport - shirted audience all they expected and more. He may have retired as director of the New York Philharmonic, but he stills throws himself into his work with teh same dynamism and enthusiasm. as ever.

His hops and little dances, familiar to Bernstein fans, are but an extension of his swinging baton.

His strokes are as vigorous as they were when at the age of 21 he was summoned to take over the baton of the ailing Bruno Walter and in so doing launched one of the most dazzling careers in the history of American music.

Berstein mounted the podium in a crisp, white suit, shaking his famous, now greying mane to the sustained applause of the thousands.

And when he had concluded the six-part Mass, his jacket now limp with persiration, Bernstein was given a standing ovation that forced him and the soloists, and the Tanglwood Choir and Festival Chorus to take repeated bows.

The "Missa Solemnis" was was composed by Beethoven for the ceremony of the installation of Archdfuke Rudolph of Austria upon his elevation to position as Archbishop of Olomouc. Beethoven was not asked to compose the Mass, but did it solely because he wanted to.

Unfortunately, it was not ready for the installation and wasn't performed until 1824 in St. Peterburg, four years after the ceremony.

Memorials and festivals

Serge Koussevitzky's lasting memorial is actually the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where musical talents are nurtured and, it is hoped, stimulated by teaching, rehearsal, and performance. But the commemorative aspect usually is given a focus each summer by a particular Berkshire Festival concert. This summer it happened on July 25, when Leonard Bernstein, once a conducting pupil at Tanglewood, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four soloists, and a chorus in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

It was a huge, very near exhaustive performance. And considering the afternoon's super-humidity, it must have been exhausting to the participants. Perfect it wasn't. The chorus, combining two similarly named forces, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, sang sometimes a bit thickly, and there was some of that high-note strain that is often a built-in hazard with this music. But the performance was awesomely intense and sustained in Beethoven's prodigious vision. The beginning of the "Gloria" erupted like a zealous volcano, and Joseph Silverstein's violin solo in the "Benedictus," accompanied ethereally by two flutes, went splendidly. Most breathtaking of all were the gently billowing dynamics on "Dona nobis pacem" at the conclusion.

As 11th-hour replacements, soprano Phyllis Curtin and contralto Maureen Forrester poured out a lot of vibrant song, and tenor William Cochran contributed some semi-heroic sound. Baritone Sherrill Milnes, taking a role usually given to basses, seemed overmatched by the music.

But the total sum of the performance was what counted, and it was very great.

AUGUST HEAT in New York has been bringing with it for the last several years either Mozart or Mostly Mozart Festivals at super-air-conditioned Philharmonic Hall. This summer's go-round at Wolfgang Amadeus, relieved occasionally by Haydn and Schubert, began August 2 with a fine free-lance group named for the month the New York Chamber Orchestra and conducted, for this program only, by the Baltimore Symphony's upcoming musical director from Rumania, Sergiu Comissiona.

Conductor and orchestra started off with a crisp, lively, and often elegant reading of Haydn's Symphony No. 83, named "The Hen" because of a faintly persistent clucking motif in the first movement. Following this came Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 17 in G, with Alfred Brendel playing the keyboard part in a dynamically small-dimensioned but beautifully phrased performance. The pianist's tonal control and articulation, given his interpretive purposes, were masterly, making the interpretation itself all the more convincing to me.

The other soloist of the evening was soprano Benita Valente, singing two Mozart arias—"Ruhe sanft, mein holdes Leben" from the unfinished early opera, "Zaide," and the famous and technically difficult-to-sustain "Vorrei spiegarvi, oh Dio!" which has long outlived the Pasquale Anfossi opera into which it had been inserted. Miss Valente, who introduced the swoon-inciting melodic line of "Ruhe sanft" to most of us at the instigation of Boris Goldovsky at a Mozart Festival concert in the same hall a few summers ago, sang most of it last week with a remarkably luminous tone quality, but the highest notes —not really all that high, they are actually around A—were still giving her some trouble, and the considerable emotional content of the aria was barely hinted at. The other aria also needed more vocal acting and a better sustained line.

On August 5, the festival put on a program made up of numbers from several Mozart operas, most of them familiar. Eve Queler conducted with almost prevailing efficiency and looked like a brunette Tuesday Weld. The less familiar items included the numbers from "Lucio Silla;" the great trio, "Pria di partir" from "Idomeneo;" two pieces from "La Clemenza di Tito;" and "L'Amero, saro costante" from

Continued on next page

music

Continued from preceding page

"Il Re pastore."

Of the soloists, a Negro soprano named Jeannette Walters proved herself a genuine find, negotiating the awesome rondo, "Per Pieta" from "Cosi fan tutte" with a secure technique and solidly supported tone over that aria's uncommonly wide range.

Nadia Witkowska also made a striking impression with her lovely handling of the number from "Il Re pastore," and lively music and characterization came from Nancy Shade, Gary Glaze, Robert Paul, and Will Roy.

One curious thing about the program was the fact that the more familiar music, except for "Don Giovanni" excerpts, was sung in the standard Ruth and Thomas Martin English translations while the unusual things were kept in the original Italian. Was it because the singers only knew the standard stuff in their English versions and were too lazy to learn the originals, or was it because the time or money could not be spent to translate the rarer material into English? Does this kind of expediency have a place in a partly subsidized music festival?

One other gripe. Dr. William Ober's program notes for the operatic evening betrayed a spectacular innocence about what goes on in some of Mozart's operas. For instance, good doctor, Papageno plays the pipes, not a flute, before his interrupted suicide. Tamino does not find Pamina's picture immediately on reviving from his fainting spell. Fiordiligi's actual lover is Guglielmo, not Ferrando. As Alice Ghostley once howled so memorably in a Broadway-revue parody of Arthur Miller—"Pay attention!"

IN THE NEXT FEW WEEKS, I'm going to try to include in this column, besides current musical events as they come along, a recap by installments of the unusually full 1970-1971 season. There is a danger of small events getting lost among the big ones and of promising new music getting knocked by the wayside in discussions of old and new masterpieces. I'll try to be careful.

ONE OF THESE small events concerned a promising composer who is still a student, but whose work is beginning to be noticed. I didn't get to a Carnegie Recital Hall devoted entirely to the works of Patricia Del Re, but I did hear a tape of the program. Her compositional vocabulary was still small at the time of the concert, but already, especially in writing for the violin, there was evidence of a real gift for realizing what instruments can do and what makes them sing. Vocabulary comes with training and instruction. What I heard of Mrs. Del Re's music indicated the presence of something special that can never be taught.

—Leighton Kerner

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

AUG 12 1971

63

Bernstein conducts Beethoven piece

'Missa Solemnis' at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The "Missa Solemnis" is Beethoven's greatest single achievement. A unique intersection of his grandest, most brilliant, public style and of that most private, uncompromisingly dense and complex style of his old age, it is surely the most searching interpretation to which any musician ever subjected the test of the Oridinary Mass, composed from out of a condition of spirit that afforded him limitless capacities for jubilation, terror, awe and serenity. A further marvel, and a very moving one, is how his fantasy, after years of deafness, continued to be so in touch with the physical reality of sound.

Because of its stupefying difficulties for conductor, singers, and players, and because, being difficult for listeners as well it is no means the guaranteed public success that the Ninth Symphony is, the "Missa Solemnis" is also the most rarely performed of Beethoven's major works. A good performance, then, is instantly a festival, and the performance which Leonard Bernstein conducted in memory of Serge Koussevitzky at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, at Tanglewood was, in fact, a superb one.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir were prepared by John Oliver. The soloists were Phyllic Curtin, soprano; Maureen Forrester, alto; William Cochran, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, bass, both women substituting at short notice for their indisposed colleagues Arleen Saunders and Florence Kopleff. Miss Curtin did not even have a chance to sing in the dress rehearsal Saturday morning.

Bernstein, in the right equilibrium of turned on and collected, is as able as any Beethoven conductor now working. He showed that when he conducted the Ninth in Boston in April of last year and again with the "Missa Solemnis" yesterday, this time in a situation far more challenging conceptually and technically.

It was exciting, rhythmic, perceptive of musical character, and, with all that, powerfully disciplined. There was the fury and fire of discovery about the performance — the "Missa" sounded as it should, like a new piece — and it was very clean, very straight. I had doubts only about two of the tempi, those for the "In Gloria Dei Patris" fugue and for "Pleni Sunt Coeli," which seemed fast, not so much for themselves as for the still greater speed with which Beethoven follows each, and a question also about that final, quiet, echoes-of-war kettle drum actions in the "Donna Nobis Pachem," which surely wants to be on B flat and not B natural.

The details of the performance were impressively filled in by all participants. The chorus was excellent, and the orchestra played with engagement, precision, and fine sound. The violin solo in the Benedictus was beautifully done by Joseph Silverstein, who has just the right sweetness and elegance for that extraordinary romance - become - sublime. The solo quartet, even with what I thought an excessive collective vibrato, was very good one and Miss Curtin's singing and especially Mr. Cochran's was very expressive and distinguished indeed.

The performance of the "Missa Solemnis" wound a up a whole weekend of Beethoven concerts, William Steinberg's programs ing included the Third, Fifth and Seventh symphonies, and the violin concerto (Itzhak Perlman).

Beethoven, who was nearly sued by one publisher as a result of his attempt to cheat six of them over the rights to his Mass, might have been pleased to know that his three concerts brought Tanglewood and attendance approaching 40,000 and the biggest box office income for a single weekend in it history.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

Bernstein at Tanglewood

Music Impresses Marlboro Group

By DONRAE W. HOGSETT
Telegram Marlboro Bureau

MARLBORO — "Well, I don't know much about his music, but I'll say one thing for him, he's got a lot of energy." Al Brigham reflected on the long drive back home.

"He hops around there like a grasshopper," he said.

Al thought he liked Beethoven but was really impressed with Leonard Bernstein. "He just didn't want to stand still."

Al was one of about 40 Marlboro residents who made the trip to Tanglewood yesterday to see Leonard Bernstein conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." The day's outing was sponsored by the Friends of the Public Library and the group made it out to Lennox by bus, leaving Marlboro shortly after 10 a.m.

Mostly Women

The group was made up mostly of women — they outnumbered the men about five to one — and they were all out to enjoy themselves.

Dressed informally but well, they carried lunches in picnic baskets and airline trip bags and boarded the bus behind the library shortly after 10 a.m.

Happy chatter filled the bus during most of the more than two-hour drive but with the air muggy, the air-conditioner in the bus not working and the journey growing tiring, the conversation died off a little towards the end.

Finally at Tanglewood, surrounded by green mountains and looking down on blue Lake Mankeenac, the group brightened as it got off the bus. Then it was down to the serious business of eating under the trees on the long green lawns.

The lunch menu was as varied as the people who made the trip. For some it was chicken salad sandwiches. For one woman of a more romantic bent, it was slicing a thick cheese, a loaf of French bread and sipping rose wine.

Lunch done, it was a quick trip through the gardens of Tanglewood and appreciation of the grounds.

Then into the music shed for the concert. When one woman found out where she was sitting, she balked a little at the location. "I feel like I'm sitting in Pittsfield," she said. "I think that's the stage way down there."

The woman's dispostiion wasn't helped any when a mod-haired young man sat in front of her, nearly eclipsing her view of the conductor.

The chatter kept up, even increased a little, as the group sat waiting for the concert. Waiting really for Bernstein.

It was all worth waiting for. Bernstein disappointed no one. As Al Brigham said, "He's got a lot of energy." More impressive than Bernstein, though, was the music.

Musician Impressed

"It was exciting, it really was," said Martha Yacyshn. As a musician, a pianist, she'd be the one to know. "It was just a wonderful concert. They all played so well."

She was particularly impressed by Bernstein's conducting — "He barely looked at the score all the way through," and by violin solo by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein — "He went through all of that without a flaw and he wasn't going by the score either."

The concert over, the Marlboro group joined the audience as it gave Bernstein, the orchestra, chorus and solists a long and exuberant standing ovation.

And then it was back on the bus and back to Marlboro. This time there was less conversation, a lot less energy. One woman leaned back in her seat and dozed. Another read a paper. Two woman cracked open another bottle of wine and enjoyed the day all the more.

And then they were all back home.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

JUL 26 1971

New England Newsclip

Thousands Cheer Leonard Bernstein

By BARNET D. LASCHEVER
Sunday Editor

LENOX, Mass. — It would be nice to be able to say that a near record crowd of music lovers flocked to Tanglewood yesterday afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony play Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D."

They didn't. They jammed the giant music shed and spread themselves, blanket to blanket with their picnic hampers on the lawn to watch and cheer the now almost legendary conductor, Leonard Bernstein.

It was Bernstein's only appearance this year as director at Tanglewood and his fans came from all over. He had selected the seldom performed Beethoven to honor the great Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949, who died just 20 years ago.

Bernstein gave his mostly sport - shirted audience all they expected and more. He may have retired as director of the New York Philharmonic, but he stills throws himself into his work with teh same dynamism and enthusiasm. as ever.

His hops and little dances, familiar to Bernstein fans, are but an extension of his swinging baton.

His strokes are as vigorous as they were when at the age of 21 he was summoned to take over the baton of the ailing Bruno Walter and in so doing launched one of the most dazzling careers in the history of American music.

Berstein mounted the podium in a crisp, white suit, shaking his famous, now greying mane to the sustained applause of the thousands.

And when he had concluded the six-part Mass, his jacket now limp with persiration, Bernstein was given a standing ovation that forced him and the soloists, and the Tanglwood Choir and Festival Chorus to take repeated bows.

The "Missa Solemnis" was was composed by Beethoven for the ceremony of the installation of Archdfuke Rudolph of Austria upon his elevation to position as Archbishop of Olomouc. Beethoven was not asked to compose the Mass, but did it solely because he wanted to.

Unfortunately, it was not ready for the installation and wasn't performed until 1824 in St. Peterburg, four years after the ceremony.

64

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,261

JUL 27 1971 New England Newsclip

12,542 at Tanglewood

Bernstein conducts the Missa Solemnis

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Leonard Bernstein's only appearance this summer with the Boston Symphony drew 12,542 listeners to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon. The work he chose was Beethoven's massive and somewhat problematical Missa Solemnis, in itself hardly a crowd pleaser, so the concert, with its distinguished soloists, orchestra, and augmented chorus, took on the air of a special occasion, with the conductor as its focal point. The fact, too, that the performance of this seldom-heard masterwork was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. Bernstein's mentor and, of course, BSO's founding father at Tanglewood, clothed the afternoon with a suitable solemnity.

In setting the Latin text of the mass, Beethoven seized on all the challenges of its infinite possibilities, with the result that the Missa Solemnis is an overpowering torrent of musical ideas almost too numerous for the ear to assimilate. The choral and instrumental blend of sound, interwoven with the solo voices of the quartet, thunderous might contrasted with the most touching and subdued lyricism, eloquent expressions of militant belief and simple faith, all have their places in this extraordinary outpouring of individualistic religious feeling.

Man for the job

Aside from the complexity of the score and the large forces it requires, the Missa Solemnis is not often attempted because it needs an overall directorial concept and a musical reining-in of its disparate elements that not all conductors are qualified to give. Mr. Bernstein is one who has what it takes. This performance was shaped, controlled, and projected with a really wondrous combination of skill and feeling that never permitted excesses of sound or sentimentality (and there are opportunities for both) to intrude on the surging statement of the work as a whole. Here the conductor was in the position of translating Beethoven's statement of faith, assembled with an almost indiscriminate use of his compositional powers, into empathic sound. His success in accomplishing it was unmistakable.

Phyllis Curtin

Leonard Bernstein

Maureen Forrester

The orchestra, in top playing form, and the soul-stirring Tanglewood Festival Chorus, supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir, both of which John Oliver has already infused with equal malleability and finesse, responded flawlessly to Mr. Bernstein's baton.

As for the soloists, both soprano Phyllis Curtin and contralto Maureen Forrester had taken over at short notice from indisposed colleagues, while tenor William Cochran, and baritone Sherrill Milnes completed the quartet. Under these pressing circumstances, Miss Curtin shone particularly, if not unpredictably, in some of the most difficult and exposed high passages, which she negotiated with lovely quality and warmth. The rich voices of Miss Forrester and Mr. Milnes were also very much in the frame, and if Mr. Cochran's tenor doesn't yet have a similar strength of utterance in this company, he sings with musicianship and appeal.

Silverstein solo

Not listed among the soloists but definitely of their acclaimed number was concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, whose extended solo passages in the "Benedictus" were played with a celestial beauty which transcended thoughts of tone or technique.

The concert proceeded without intermission but with two short intervals, so that it was not until the final "Dona nobis pacem," conveyed with a glorious climactic burst, that the massive audience in and outside the Shed was able to express its feelings. There were countless recalls for the soloists (who also received warm embraces from their conductor), special cheers for instrumentalists and singers, and finally a deafening torrent of recognition of Mr. Bernstein and his selfless services to Beethoven and Koussevitsky.

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 210,540

JUL 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Bernstein Conducts BSO at Tanglewood

By HARRY NEVILLE

LENOX—Leonard Bernstein drew one of the season's largest crowds to Tanglewood yesterday afternoon when he conducted the Boston Symphony, the Tanglewood Chorus and Choir and a quartet of vocal soloists in one of Beethoven's greatest and most difficult works, the Missa Solemnis.

The concert honored the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, former music director of the orchestra as well as an early mentor and champion of Bernstein. The event thus had a very personal significance for many of the musicians involved—a significance one liked to think was responsible for the quality of some of the playing, which at its best was eloquent in a simple, straightforward way that one doesn't invariably associate with this conductor.

TO BE SURE, Bernstein was in good athletic form—good enough not to disappoint those who are fascinated with that aspect of his conducting. But on this occasion his podium manner was generally subdued, relatively speaking, and for this listener the concert was one of his most gratifying performances, despite circumstances that must have been harrowing for everyone concerned.

There is not sufficient rehearsal time at Tanglewood to put a work like this together properly, a fact that was apparent time and again in matters of balance and ensemble. In fast passages one could have asked for a great deal more instrumental precision, and at the big moments one would have liked more clarity of texture. As it was, one had to settle for nervous excitement and massive effect.

BECAUSE OF illness, two of the vocal soloists had to be replaced at the last moment. Soprano Phyllis Curtin took the place of Arlene Saunders and contralto Maureen Forrester sang in place of Florence Kopleff. Neither replacement could have been very prepared, and yet both of them turned in compelling performances that meshed well with Bernstein's overall concept. Tenor William Cochran and baritone Sherrill Milnes completed the quartet. Both gave rich, expressive accounts of their parts, with Cochran only once pushing beyond the volume limits of what seems to be a lyric-type voice.

The chorus sang with immense and commendable enthusiasm, although few of the sopranos were at all comfortable in the topmost range of their part.

Triumphant Weekend of Beethoven

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

I WASN'T there when Nelson came back from Trafalgar nor when Wellington came back from Waterloo, but I can't help wondering if the acclaim accorded them after their respective victories equalled that accorded Leonard Bernstein yesterday afternoon at the completion of the performance of the Beethoven Missa Solemnis.

The triumph was well-deserved. Bernstein drove his excellently trained choir, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir with John Oliver, director, with unrelentingly meshing engagement and achieved a might conquest. He was supported by the Boston Symphony in one of its most susceptible moods and four exceptional soloists: soprano Phyllis Curtin, contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor William Cochran and bass Sherrill Milnes.

In spite of the title, there are few really solemn moments in the Missa Solemnis. Bernstein generated excitement at every opportunity and, at the proper time when contrasts of tranquility were befitting, the effects were doubly accentuated. The conductor whipped up a near-frenzy at the finale of the Credo. Beethoven, supermaster of his craft, astutely starts the ensuing Sanctus with one of his most deeply felt and pristine statements. The composer begs that it be played "with devotion" and to that admonishment Bernstein was completely faithful.

From that point on, there are many expressions of varying content but, in general, they are more serene. After a short Praeludium, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was allotted the solo of rare beauty which he discharged with exquisite reticence.

* * *

CAN ANYONE explain why we cling to Beethoven and Shakespeare when we have abandoned practically everything else which went out in 1827 and 1616? We need pause here only long enough to report the tremendous enthusiasm (and peak attendance) the past weekend, solely of Beethoven, attracted to the fourth group of Tanglewood concerts.

Before even attempting to answer this hypothetical question, it should immediately be mentioned that what we heard was Beethoven at his best. We had paradoxically the maturity of conductor William Steinberg, the galvanically inspiring Bernstein and the inexplicable sublimity of the youthful violinist Itzhak Perlman, and a Boston Symphony Orchestra playing consistently as though their reputation depended on every note.

Steinberg represents mature Beethoven at its apogee, the culmination of a long lifetime of distillation, possibly of trial and error. Beethoven had informed all who read, where to go fast or slow, soft or loud, and left us many roadsigns and traffic indications. It is deeply gratifying to see them all observed but, beyond that, with discretion and taste and insight. Moreover, to see an alert, sensitive orchestra respond to previous agreements about ritards, rubatos, sudden pianos, and all the slight details of a performance which distinguish it from routine.

There are a million tricks to the trade, and all concerned in the three weekend concerts were aware of all of them. Bernstein surely knows how to spark a responsive ensemble of singers and instrumentalists; Steinberg not only knows when but how to achieve all the myriad facets which illuminate a performance and raise it from dull commonplace. Of Perlman, one can only say that his reading of the violin concerto was as moving a musical experience as this writer can recall.

* * *

STEINBERG in his two programs Friday and Saturday evenings played the three middle odd - numbered symphonies, each, not thereby excluding the others, a Mt. Everest on its own. Or might one better say a Gibraltar, for each of the three not only soars into the heights but is also basically so firm and substantial that nothing can move or alter their juxtaposition in music.

Happily for music, and all art for that matter, there have always been imaginative interpreters: men who stoke the fires of the immortal creators of our greatest musical works, men whose concept of a symphony or a choral masterpiece surveys the long-range perspective with telescopes and reveals the smallest particles with magnifying glasses. The beat of the moment is less important than the anticipative extrasensory message of the phrase being approached. In spite of many hearings of the familiar symphonies, there is always something new to be heard and learned. Maybe that is the reason we all go back to concerts to hear favorites and go to our libraries to reread old familiar tales.

It would seem that by this time a definitive exposition of the great symphonies and requiems would have been established, but not so. Each reading has a fresh aspect and renewed vigor. Steinberg, as an example, fortifies the opening phrase of the final movement of the Seventh by having the outside of each violin desk play the carefree rolling little dance figure on the single bow-stroke while the inside plays with detached bowings. There is no end of such advances, and students still analyze Beethoven (and Shakespeare) as scholars scrutinize the Bible for still deeper exegeses.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT, Perlman delivered a sermon. It wasn't merely violin playing. He demonstrated the magnificence of simplicity; he proved the validity of truth; he verified the strength of humanity.

How did he do it? He eschewed ostentation in every detail. He did everything right, even sitting in patient and alert dignity during the long orchestral introduction without once fiddling with the justness of his strings or displaying anything but complete attention to the conductor.

Perlman, afflicted with polio when he was 4, comes on stage with seven-league swings on his Losstrand crutches. Once seated, he laid them down, one to each side, and then his violin was handed to him. The prelude achieved, he began to tell a love story, not a maudlin one, but a tender message of beauty.

Whenever there was a possible choice, he chose the unelaborate one to a point of artlessness, in bowing, crossing strings, climbing to higher positions when a basic and lower one served; in giving agogic stress so delicately but so effectively at salient spots. Everything contributed to a cohesive story.

To convey his verses and not break melodic lines, he made use of interminable discipline and incredible control of his bow expressing on a single stroke a heart-rending appeal, revealing a Beethoven we don't often hear. We are too apt to think of Beethoven as best exemplified by the opening thunder of the fifth symphony, but Perlman conceived the concerto as totally different. Even in the most involved figures, there was both bursting tension and relaxed security of inward spirit.

The second theme of the slow movement was memorable; the final rondo had such easy briskness. Yet, in the Kreisler cadenza of the first movement, by a bit of magic prestidigitation, he surely snuck in an extra hand. No one can tell me there wasn't some invisible extra set of fingers going up the fingerboard as another descended with savage fearlessness and astonishing fury.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA and Steinberg were worthy partners in this memorable performance, matching the soloist's distinction at every juncture of sonority and of phrasing.

The "Leonore" No. 3 overture is evidently one of Steinberg's favorites. It surely is one of his tours de force. It was a performance of orchestra virtuosity, although the trumpeter offstage must have stumbled in his hasty approach to announce Don Fernando bringing succor to the imprisoned Florestan.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 26 1971
New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
JUL 26 1971
New England Newsclip

65

At Tanglewood

Bernstein, Beethoven Combine To Excite Audience of 12,542

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Leonard Bernstein returned to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to help 12,542 listeners plant Beethoven's Missa solemnis permanently in their emotional memories.

Complex Work

That symphonic Mass is not the easiest oratoria-type work to listen to, and it is certainly not the easiest to perform; its complexity is such that a second-level performance can destroy it.

Sunday it was not only a success; it was a special kind of success. It had the stamp of Lennie Bernstein all over it, a stamp which is not always appropriate to Beethoven, but which, in this special case, put excitement and drama where it was needed but not expected.

The forces involved included the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, a quartet of soloists, an organist and a chorus of about 200 voices.

They spent an hour and three quartets performing the Mass without intermission, but with a five-minute "seventh-inning stretch" after the Credo during which the soloists and Bernstein left the stage.

There was little doubt from the beginning about who was in charge. . .of the listeners, at least. Bernstein is a dynamic forceful presence on the podium. He rivets the attention.

His involvement in the music and his communication with the singers and instrumentalists is apparently complete; his choreographic style, his loose-jointed, free-swinging, high-jumping manner seems impulsive and distracting, but in itself is entertaining. . . .except to the musically fastidious who demand a less theatrical conductor.

Sunday, though, Lennie's style was slightly subdued, and the drama he infused into Beethoven's giant masterpiece gave it life and color and a sustained intensity.

Among the soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, was the most satisfying. She was a substitute for Arlene Saunders whose absence from the stage was decided only at noon Saturday.

Miss Curtin is well known on the Tanglewood stage, having spent several summers as a member of the vocal faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

She is a soprano whose

PHYLLIS CURTIN

brilliance of tone and excellence of vocal technique are recognized over the world, but Sunday, I think, (except for only one or two notes) she sang with a warmth and beauty unusual even for her.

The other soloists, Maureen Forrester, contralto; William Cochran, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, bass, were, probably equally pleasing for most listeners. They sang, for all practical purposes, without flaw.

But for sheer size and power, the Missa solemnis nearly overwhelms the soloists; the overriding effect is of a high level of excitement and intensity releived only occasionally, most notably near the end, when a benign instrumental interlude between the Sanctus and Benedictus leads into a vocal Benedictus of easy lyricism.

The big Mass has a lot of crowd-pleasing power, but under special circumstances the simplest of ingredients can produce a near-perfect concert and also attract a giant audience.

Saturday Concert

Saturday night there were 12,359 listeners to hear William Steinberg lead the orchestra through an all-Beethoven program which offered only the King Stephen overture and the third and seventh symphonies.

The music, of course, is from another age, but its eternal viability was thoroughly demonstrated again Saturday.

It is beautiful and strong, and the orchestra gave it a performance that throbbed with life. The outlines were unusually crisp, the accents dramatic, the string tones singing like a choir of angels.

The architecture was open, widely spatial; Steinberg paid extra homage to the long, slow, leisurely line while not losing sight of internal precision, so there were those in the audience who sighed at the passage of time.

It was too slow, in my opinion, and toward the end of the seventh symphony there was a touch of the opposite atmosphere; a bit of frenzy invaded the, if you'll pardon the expression, allegro con brio. These are just little quibbles reported in the line of duty.

The subjective fact is that two of the greatest symphonies ever written, the third and seventh, were heard played magnificently by one of the world's great orchestras by 12,357 people, plus radio.

The orchestra's press office said Sunday the weekend attendance was 38,186, which, at the halfway mark, puts the season's total at 108,177, or 27,000 ahead of last season at the same time.

The office said, also, that the weekend recorded an "all-time high in box-office dollars," but it wouldn't say exactly how much.

Triumphant Weekend of Beethoven

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

I WASN'T there when Nelson came back from Trafalgar nor when Wellington came back from Waterloo, but I can't help wondering if the acclaim accorded them after their respective victories equalled that accorded Leonard Bernstein yesterday afternoon at the completion of the performance of the Beethoven Missa Solemnis.

The triumph was well-deserved. Bernstein drove his excellently trained choir, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir with John Oliver, director, with unrelentingly meshing engagement and achieved a might conquest. He was supported by the Boston Symphony in one of its most susceptible moods and four exceptional soloists: soprano Phyllis Curtin, contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor William Cochran and bass Sherrill Milnes.

In spite of the title, there are few really solemn moments in the Missa Solemnis. Bernstein generated excitement at every opportunity and, at the proper time when contrasts of tranquility were befitting, the effects were doubly accentuated. The conductor whipped up a near-frenzy at the finale of the Credo. Beethoven, supermaster of his craft, astutely starts the ensuing Sanctus with one of his most deeply felt and pristine statements. The composer begs that it be played "with devotion" and to that admonishment Bernstein was completely faithful.

From that point on, there are many expressions of varying content but, in general, they are more serene. After a short Praeludium, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was allotted the solo of rare beauty which he discharged with exquisite reticence.

* * *

CAN ANYONE explain why we cling to Beethoven and Shakespeare when we have abandoned practically everything else which went out in 1827 and 1616? We need pause here only long enough to report the tremendous enthusiasm (and peak attendance) the past weekend, solely of Beethoven, attracted to the fourth group of Tanglewood concerts.

Before even attempting to answer this hypothetical question, it should immediately be mentioned that what we heard was Beethoven at his best. We had paradoxically the maturity of conductor William Steinberg, the galvanically inspiring Bernstein and the inexplicable sublimity of the youthful violinist Itzhak Perlman, and a Boston Symphony Orchestra playing consistently as though their reputation depended on every note.

Steinberg represents mature Beethoven at its apogee, the culmination of a long lifetime of distillation, possibly of trial and error. Beethoven had informed all who read, where to go fast or slow, soft or loud, and left us many roadsigns and traffic indications. It is deeply gratifying to see them all observed but, beyond that, with discretion and taste and insight. Moreover, to see an alert, sensitive orchestra respond to previous agreements about ritards, rubatos, sudden pianos, and all the slight details of a performance which distinguish it from routine.

There are a million tricks to the trade, and all concerned in the three weekend concerts were aware of all of them. Bernstein surely knows how to spark a responsive ensemble of singers and instrumentalists; Steinberg not only knows when but how to achieve all the myriad facets which illuminate a performance and raise it from dull commonplace. Of Perlman, one can only say that his reading of the violin concerto was as moving a musical experience as this writer can recall.

* * *

STEINBERG in his two programs Friday and Saturday evenings played the three middle odd - numbered symphonies, each, not thereby excluding the others, a Mt. Everest on its own. Or might one better say a Gibraltar, for each of the three not only soars into the heights but is also basically so firm and substantial that nothing can move or alter their juxtaposition in music.

Happily for music, and all art for that matter, there have always been imaginative interpreters: men who stoke the fires of the immortal creators of our greatest musical works, men whose concept of a symphony or a choral masterpiece surveys the long-range perspective with telescopes and reveals the smallest particles with magnifying glasses. The beat of the moment is less important than the anticipative extrasensory message of the phrase being approached. In spite of many hearings of the familiar symphonies, there is always something new to be heard and learned. Maybe that is the reason we all go back to concerts to hear favorites and go to our libraries to reread old familiar tales.

It would seem that by this time a definitive exposition of the great symphonies and requiems would have been established, but not so. Each reading has a fresh aspect and renewed vigor. Steinberg, as an example, fortifies the opening phrase of the final movement of the Seventh by having the outside of each violin desk play the carefree rolling little dance figure on the single bow-stroke while the inside plays with detached bowings. There is no end of such advances, and students still analyze Beethoven (and Shakespeare) as scholars scrutinize the Bible for still deeper exegeses.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT, Perlman delivered a sermon. It wasn't merely violin playing. He demonstrated the magnificence of simplicity; he proved the validity of truth; he verified the strength of humanity.

How did he do it? He eschewed ostentation in every detail. He did everything right, even sitting in patient and alert dignity during the long orchestral introduction without once fiddling with the justness of his strings or displaying anything but complete attention to the conductor.

Perlman, afflicted with polio when he was 4, comes on stage with seven-league swings on his Losstrand crutches. Once seated, he laid them down, one to each side, and then his violin was handed to him. The prelude achieved, he began to tell a love story, not a maudlin one, but a tender message of beauty.

Whenever there was a possible choice, he chose the unelaborate one to a point of artlessness, in bowing, crossing strings, climbing to higher positions when a basic and lower one served; in giving agogic stress so delicately but so effectively at salient spots. Everything contributed to a cohesive story.

To convey his verses and not break melodic lines, he made use of interminable discipline and incredible control of his bow expressing on a single stroke a heart-rending appeal, revealing a Beethoven we don't often hear. We are too apt to think of Beethoven as best exemplified by the opening thunder of the fifth symphony, but Perlman conceived the concerto as totally different. Even in the most involved figures, there was both bursting tension and relaxed security of inward spirit.

The second theme of the slow movement was memorable; the final rondo had such easy briskness. Yet, in the Kreisler cadenza of the first movement, by a bit of magic prestidigitation, he surely snuck in an extra hand. No one can tell me there wasn't some invisible extra set of fingers going up the fingerboard as another descended with savage fearlessness and astonishing fury.

* * *

THE ORCHESTRA and Steinberg were worthy partners in this memorable performance, matching the soloist's distinction at every juncture of sonority and of phrasing.

The "Leonore" No. 3 overture is evidently one of Steinberg's favorites. It surely is one of his tours de force. It was a performance of orchestra virtuosity, although the trumpeter offstage must have stumbled in his hasty approach to announce Don Fernando bringing succor to the imprisoned Florestan.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 26 1971
New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
JUL 26 1971
New England Newsclip

65

At Tanglewood

Bernstein, Beethoven Combine To Excite Audience of 12,542

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Leonard Bernstein returned to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to help 12,542 listeners plant Beethoven's Missa solemnis permanently in their emotional memories.

Complex Work

That symphonic Mass is not the easiest oratoria-type work to listen to, and it is certainly not the easiest to perform; its complexity is such that a second-level performance can destroy it.

Sunday it was not only a success; it was a special kind of success. It had the stamp of Lennie Bernstein all over it, a stamp which is not always appropriate to Beethoven, but which, in this special case, put excitement and drama where it was needed but not expected.

The forces involved included the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, a quartet of soloists, an organist and a chorus of about 200 voices.

They spent an hour and three quartets performing the Mass without intermission, but with a five-minute "seventh-inning stretch" after the Credo during which the soloists and Bernstein left the stage.

There was little doubt from the beginning about who was in charge. . .of the listeners, at least. Bernstein is a dynamic forceful presence on the podium. He rivets the attention.

His involvement in the music and his communication with the singers and instrumentalists is apparently complete; his choreographic style, his loose-jointed, free-swinging, high-jumping manner seems impulsive and distracting, but in itself is entertaining. . . .except to the musically fastidious who demand a less theatrical conductor.

Sunday, though, Lennie's style was slightly subdued, and the drama he infused into Beethoven's giant masterpiece gave it life and color and a sustained intensity.

Among the soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, was the most satisfying. She was a substitute for Arlene Saunders whose absence from the stage was decided only at noon Saturday.

Miss Curtin is well known on the Tanglewood stage, having spent several summers as a member of the vocal faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

She is a soprano whose

PHYLLIS CURTIN

brilliance of tone and excellence of vocal technique are recognized over the world, but Sunday, I think, (except for only one or two notes) she sang with a warmth and beauty unusual even for her.

The other soloists, Maureen Forrester, contralto; William Cochran, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, bass, were, probably equally pleasing for most listeners. They sang, for all practical purposes, without flaw.

But for sheer size and power, the Missa solemnis nearly overwhelms the soloists; the overriding effect is of a high level of excitement and intensity releived only occasionally, most notably near the end, when a benign instrumental interlude between the Sanctus and Benedictus leads into a vocal Benedictus of easy lyricism.

The big Mass has a lot of crowd-pleasing power, but under special circumstances the simplest of ingredients can produce a near-perfect concert and also attract a giant audience.

Saturday Concert

Saturday night there were 12,359 listeners to hear William Steinberg lead the orchestra through an all-Beethoven program which offered only the King Stephen overture and the third and seventh symphonies.

The music, of course, is from another age, but its eternal viability was thoroughly demonstrated again Saturday.

It is beautiful and strong, and the orchestra gave it a performance that throbbed with life. The outlines were unusually crisp, the accents dramatic, the string tones singing like a choir of angels.

The architecture was open, widely spatial; Steinberg paid extra homage to the long, slow, leisurely line while not losing sight of internal precision, so there were those in the audience who sighed at the passage of time.

It was too slow, in my opinion, and toward the end of the seventh symphony there was a touch of the opposite atmosphere; a bit of frenzy invaded the, if you'll pardon the expression, allegro con brio. These are just little quibbles reported in the line of duty.

The subjective fact is that two of the greatest symphonies ever written, the third and seventh, were heard played magnificently by one of the world's great orchestras by 12,357 people, plus radio.

The orchestra's press office said Sunday the weekend attendance was 38,186, which, at the halfway mark, puts the season's total at 108,177, or 27,000 ahead of last season at the same time.

The office said, also, that the weekend recorded an "all-time high in box-office dollars," but it wouldn't say exactly how much.

66

July 27

KITE

Symphony at Tanglewood

By Milton Zapolski

In one of more important concerts of Tanglewood's eight-week long summer season, the presentation of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis under Leonard Bernstein's direction left one feeling both unsatisfied and mildly appreciative. This curious mixture was a direct result of the contrast between Bernstein and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a contrast that has become more familiar over the years in Bernstein's four appearances with the orchestra. Theatrical, supercharged Bernstein exhibits a demonstrative, unfocused approach at loggerheads with the orchestra's aristocratic and more sustained efforts. This painful conflict between zippy excessiveness and noble restraint is not likely ever to have a happy ending, only more and more partial successes.

Oddly enough, both Bernstein and the orchestra really know and love this music. Bernstein "proved" it by not consulting the score until the last page — an ostentatious gimmick. The orchestra demonstrated its familiarity by the way they would save a section, such as the Descendit part of the Credo where the chorus' intonation lapsed so the orchestra tried harder to compensate for this displeasure by yielding a really beautiful sound. Also, the orchestra was not about to abandon Beethoven's profound and deeply philosophical musical underlinings: at the Passus section of the Credo the viloins came in with this incredibly way-out harmony (so "modern") that integrated with the bass line in an extraordinary manner — few orchestras listen to one another and provide mutual support so ungrudgingly. These are two examples among many.

Why, then, wasn't this a great concert? Sad to say, the blame is mostly Bernstein's. That he can conduct the Boston Symphony and get outstanding results was shown during the Sanctus opening, where the conductor elicited incredibly fine playing simply by not pushing so hard and conducting intelligibly, without the racy gestures and volcanic stick technique. Similarly, the Agnus Dei went very well until the brilliant spot where Beethoven introduces terrifying threats of war in opposition to the words, "Grant us Peace." Here Bernstein got over-energetic again and the whole effect was lost as the orchestra clammed up in reaction.

It is obvious that Bernstein knows this great Mass and has a good grasp of its structure and moods, yet he was incapable of projecting this to any great degree mainly because he himself got in the way of the music.

Practically everything else about the performance was good. The chorus, comprised of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus plus the Tanglewood Choir, sounded much better than heard earlier this season and had an extra fullness on climaxes, especially in the Gloria, that was thrilling. The soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Maureen Forrester, contralto; William Cochran, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, bass; were better than average and acted as a unit rather than a collection of strengths and weaknesses.

Unfortunately Miss Curtin (a substitute for Arlene Saunders) was in poor voice and not up to her usually high standards. Forrester and Cochran had fine moments continually, Forrester sounding especially good. Milnes did a wonderful job at the start of the Agnus Dei, but earlier foolishly or selfishly destroyed the rapt idyll of the Benedictus by entering much louder than the solo violin (played exquisitely by Joseph Silverstein), in turn influencing both quartet and chorus to be much louder than they should be.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Leonard Bernstein's only appearance this summer with the Boston Symphony drew 12,542 listeners to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon. The work he chose was Beethoven's massive and somewhat problematical Missa Solemnis, in itself hardly a crowd pleaser, so the concert, with its distinguished soloists, orchestra, and augmented chorus, took on the air of a special occasion, with the conductor as its focal point. The fact, too, that the performance of this seldom-heard masterwork was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, Mr. Bernstein's mentor and, of course, BSO's founding father at Tanglewood, clothed the afternoon with a suitable solemnity.

In setting the Latin text of the mass, Beethoven seized on all the challenges of its infinite possibilities, with the result that the Missa Solemnis is an overpowering torrent of musical ideas almost too numerous for the ear to assimilate. The choral and instrumental blend of sound, interwoven with the solo voices of the quartet, thunderous might contrasted with the most touching and subdued lyricism, eloquent expressions of militant belief and simple faith, all have their places in this extraordinary outpouring of individualistic religious feeling.

Man for the job

Aside from the complexity of the score and the large forces it requires, the Missa Solemnis is not often attempted because it needs an overall directorial concept and a musical reining-in of its disparate elements that not all conductors are qualified to give. Mr. Bernstein is one who has what it takes. This performance was shaped, controlled, and projected with a really wondrous combination of skill and feeling that never permitted excesses of sound or sentimentality (and there are opportunities for both) to intrude on the surging statement of the work as a whole. Here the conductor was in the position of translating Beethoven's statement of faith, assembled with an almost indiscriminate use of his compositional powers, into empathic sound. His success in accomplishing it was unmistakable.

The orchestra, in top playing form, and the soul-stirring Tanglewood Festival Chorus, supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir, both of which John Oliver has already infused with equal malleability and finesse, responded flawlessly to Mr. Bernstein's baton.

As for the soloists, both soprano Phyllis Curtin and contralto Maureen Forrester had taken over at short notice from indisposed colleagues, while tenor William Cochran, and baritone Sherrill Milnes completed the quartet. Under these pressing circumstances, Miss Curtin shone particularly, if not unpredictably, in some of the most difficult and exposed high passages, which she negotiated with lovely quality and warmth. The rich voices of Miss Forrester and Mr. Milnes were also very much in the frame, and if Mr. Cochran's tenor doesn't yet have a similar strength of utterance in this company, he sings with musicianship and appeal.

Silverstein solo

Not listed among the soloists but definitely of their acclaimed number was concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, whose extended solo passages in the "Benedictus" were played with a celestial beauty which transcended thoughts of tone or technique.

The concert proceeded without intermission but with two short intervals, so that it was not until the final "Dona nobis pacem," conveyed with a glorious climactic burst, that the massive audience in and outside the Shed was able to express its feelings. There were countless recalls for the soloists (who also received warm embraces from their conductor), special cheers for instrumentalists and singers, and finally a deafening torrent of recognition of Mr. Bernstein and his selfless services to Beethoven and Koussevitsky.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

JUL 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Fifth Tanglewood concerts offer music from Renaissance to Ruggles

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday evening, July 30 at 9 in the Shed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Suntreader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The weekend prelude, at 7 p.m. on Friday in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Weekend prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony open rehearsal takes place Saturday morning, July 30 at 10:30 in the Shed. These open rehearsals, held each Saturday morning in the Shed, offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music. Seats are unreserved at $2.50 each and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening July 30 at 8:30 in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion.

The program in Haydn's Symphony no. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Stomu Yamash'ta, one of the foremost percussion virtuosi in music today, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He has appeared in Europe at the Festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon. He has performed with the Boston Symphony on numerous occasions.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1 at 2:30. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 27. The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. Beginning at 6:30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30 p.m. the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Boston Symphony Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

JUL 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Week of Aug. 1

MUSIC: Tanglewood: August 1: Daniel Barenboim, 2:30 p.m. Schubert's Rosamunde' overture, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Pinchas Zukerman, Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 . . . Friday, August 6: Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m., Phyllis Curtin. Colin Davis, Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, Wood's Cello concerto, Zara Nelsova, Dvorak's Symphony No. 7 op. 70, 9 p.m. . . . Saturday, August 7: Open Rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. William Steinberg, Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass, Schuller's Five Bagatelles, Bruckner's Symphony no. 7, 8:30 p.m. . . . The Lenox Arts Center: August 7: Mary Travers, 7:30 p.m. . . . Music Mountain: August 1: Guest Artist, Natasha Magg, piano, Haydn's Quartet in C, Opus 54, No. 2, Bach's Gamba Sonata No. 3 in G Minor, Schubert's Quartet in D Minor, 4 p.m. Saturday, August 7: Guest artist Sidney Foster, piano, Mozart's Quartet in G, K. 387, Brahms' Violin Sonata in D Minor, Opus 108, Dohnanyi's Piano Quintet in C Minor, Opus 1, 3 p.m. Yale Concerts: August 4: Aldo Parisot, the Hayden Cello Concerto.

5th WEEKEND

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
D. 33,737

JUL 23 1971 New England Newsclip

Out of town

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begins next Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Suntreader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, will conduct the Boston Symphony July 31 in the Shed. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia."

Daniel Barenboim, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony will conduct on Aug. 1 at 2:30 p.m. He will conduct Schubert's Overture to "Tosamunde," Lalo's Symphonie espagnole and Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students at the music center, takes place next Tuesday with the grounds opening the public at 5:30 p.m. Beginning at 6:30, simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30, a concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Thomas conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Ozawa will then conduct the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok. Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller, will then conduct a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure."

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 260,961

JUL 25 1971 New England Newsclip

5th weekend at Tanglewood

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday at 9:00 pm in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun - treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 pm on Friday, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 pm Boston Symphony concert.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Saturday evening at 8:30 pm with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia".

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor Sunday, August 1, at 2:30 pm. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Mr. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 27. The grounds will open to the public at 5:30 pm. Beginning at 6:30 pm, simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30 pm, the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Seiji Ozawa then conducts the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok. Tanglewood's other Artistic Director, Gunther Schuller, then conducts a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure."

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

JUL 28 1971

Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday at 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude with the Berkshire Boys Choir. 9 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony in Copland, Ruggles, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky. Saturday at 10:30 a.m. Open Rehearsal. 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts a program of Haydn, Prokofiev with Byron Janis, and Takemitsu with Etomu Yamashta. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Daniel Barenboim conducts a program of Schubert, Lalo with Pinchas Zukerman, and Tchaikovsky. Tuesday at 8:30, Boston Pops, Arthur Fiedler conducting.

SPAC Amphitheater, Saratoga, Today at 8:30 p.m., New York City Ballet in "Swan Lake," "In the Night," "Concerto for Two Solo Pianos," "La Valse." Thursday at 8:30 p.m., "Serenade," "Prodigal Son," "Firebird." Friday at 2:30 p.m., Student Matinee, "Serenade," "Concerto for Two Solo Pianos," "Who Cares?" Friday at 8:30 p.m., "Firebird," "Monumentum/Movements," "The Cage," "Agon." Saturday, final performances of the Ballet, 2 p.m., "Serenade," "Concerto for Two Solo Pianos," "Episodes," "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue." 8:30 p.m., "Who Cares?," "Monumentum/Rovements," and a new ballet to be announced.

Sunday at 8:30 p.m., The Preservation Hall Jazz Band. Monday at 8:30 p.m., The Who. Tuesday at 2:30 p.m., Student Matinee by the Philadelphia Orchestra, William Smith conducting: Wagner, Prelude to Die Meistersinger; Liszt, Les Preludes; Brahms, Symphony No. 2.

SPAC, Canfield Casino, Saratoga. Chamber Music Series. Norman Carol presents a violin concert of Handel, Beethoven, Brahms.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Byron Janis

. . . will be soloist at his third major festival this summer when he plays Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto on Saturday evening, July 31, at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony under Seiji Ozawa's direction.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

JUL 22 1971 New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox in Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe" and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act 3 of "Swan Lake," Friday, July 30, at 9 p.m. Also on the program will be Ruggle's "Sun-treader." The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the shed features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing Renaissance music. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's Artist director, will conduct the Boston Symphony on Saturday, July 31, at 8:30 p.m. in Haydn's Symphony No. 96 and Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto with soloist Byron Janis. Also featured will be Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" starring percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Daniel Barenboim will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony's Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1, concert at 2:30. Featured will be Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," Lalo's "Symphony Espagnol and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Violin soloist in the Lalo work will be Pinchas Zukerman.

68

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

JUL 25 1971 New England Newsclip

BYRON JANIS

AT TANGLEWOOD

All-Orchestral Program

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct an all - orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun - treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the "Divertissement" from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. on Friday in the Shed, will feature the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal will take place Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. These Open Rehearsals, held each Saturday morning, offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music.

Seats are unreserved at $2.50 each and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Tanglewood artistic co-director, Seiji Ozawa, will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano and Stomu Yamashita, percussion.

The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with percussionist Stomu Yamashita.

Yamashita, one of the foremost percussion virtuosi in music today, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic.

He has appeared in Europe at the Festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon. He has performed with the Boston Symphony on numerous occasions.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1 at 2:30 p.m. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman.

Barenboim will conduct Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, will take place Tuesday. The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m.

Beginning at 6:30 p.m., simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30 p.m., the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin, with Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner.

Ozawa then will conduct the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok. Tanglewood's other artistic co-director, Gunther Schuller, will conduct a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure."

NEW LEBANON "Echo"

TUESDAY, JULY 27, 1971 PAGE 9

Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, is going into its fifth week-end of the season. Three different conductors, Thomas, Ozawa, and Barenbeim will be at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for these three concerts.

The week-end starts Friday evening, July 30th, at 7:00 with the evening prelude featuring the Berkshire Boy Choir. This will be followed at 9:00 by Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Copland's "Applachian Spring", Ruggles' "Sun-treader", Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la Russe", and Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake Divertissement" Act III.

Saturday evening at 8:30 the orchestra under the leadership of Seiji Ozawa will play Haydn's Symphony No. 96 "Miracle"; Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 with Byron Janis as soloist; Yamash'ta as soloist.

Sunday's program, at 2:30 with Daniel Barenbeim conducting, will include Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture; Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" with violinist Pinchas Zukerman as soloist; ending with Tchaikovsky's 4th symphony.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
D. 49,000 S. 39,500

JUL 30 1971

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins tonight at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun-treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. tonight in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir with music from the Renaissance, free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal takes place tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed.

Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the Boston Symphony tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Stomu Yamash'ta, one of today's foremost percussion virtuosi, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He's appeared in Europe's festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon, has also performed with the Boston Symphony.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday at 2:30 p.m. with Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Kukerman, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 6,795

JUL 29 1971 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Tanglewood Music Festival continues in Lenox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, music director. The program this weekend: Friday, 9 p.m., Thomas. Copland: Appalachian Spring; Ruggles: Sun-Treader; Stravinsky: Scherzo a la Russe; Tchaikovsky: Swan Lake-Divertissement, Act II. Saturday, 8:30 p.m. Ozawa. Haydn: Symphony No. 96 'Miracle'; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 3, Byron Janis; Takemitsu: Casiopeia, Stomu No. 4. Sunday, 2:30 p.m. Barenboim. Schubert: 'Rosamunde' Overture; Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole, Pinchas Zukerman; Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

JUL 30 1971

Boston Symphony At Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, is going into ts fifth week-end of the season. Three different conductors, Thomas, Ozawa, and Barenboim will be at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for these three concerts.

The week-end starts Friday evening, July 30th, at 7:00 with the evening prelude featuring the Berkshire Boy Choir. This will be followed at 9:00 by Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Copland's "Appalachian Spring", Ruggles' "Sun-treader", Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la Russo", and Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake - Divertissement" Act HI.

Saturday evening at 8:30 the orchestra under the leadership of Seiji Ozawa will play Haydn's Symphony No. 96 "Miracle"; Prokofiov's Piano conectro No. 3 with Byron Janis as soloist; and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with Stomu Yamash'ta as soloist.

Sunday's program, at 2:30 with Daniel Barenboim conducting, will include Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture; Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" with violinist Pinchas Zukerman as soloist; ending with Tchaikovsky's 4th Symphony.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

JUL 29 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Concerts Fifth Weekend At Tanglewood

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday evening, at 9 p.m.in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's Appalachian Spring, Ruggles' Sun-treader, Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe, and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's Swan Lake.

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. on Friday in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal takes place Saturday morning, at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. These Open Rehearsals, held each Saturday morning in the Shed, offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music.

Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion. The program is Haydn's Symphony no. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's Cassiopeia with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Stomu Yamash'ta, one of the foremost percussion virtuosi in music today, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He has appeared in Europe at the Festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon. He has performed with the Boston Symphony on numerous occasions.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon, at 2:30 p.m. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Mr. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 27. The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. Beginning at 6:30 p.m., simulataneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30 p.m., the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Boston Symphony Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to The Flying Dutchman by Wagner. Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, then conducts the Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok. Tankgewood's other Artistic Director, Gunther Schuller then conducts a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's Die Walkure.

Friday, July 30

Weekend Prelude — 7 p.m. Shed.

Berkshire Boy Choir, Peter Phillips: Ecce vicit leo. Annon. 14th century: Angelus ad virginem. Annon. 15th century: Qui creavit coelum. Claudio Casciolini: Angelus Domini. J. S. Bach: Komm, Jesu, komm. William Billings: A Virgin Unspotted Bethlehem; The Shepherd's Carol, John Shepherd: Kyrie Eleison, Claudio Montiverdi: Lauda Jerusalem.

9 p.m. Shed — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. Copland: Appalachian Spring. Ruggles: Sun-treader. Stravinsky: Scherzo a la russe. Tchaikovsky: Divertissement from Act 3 of Swan Lake.

Saturday, July 31

10:30 a.m. Shed — Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal.

8:30 p.m. Shed — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa, conductor; Byron Janis, piano; Stomu Yamashita, percussion. Haydn: Symphony Symphony No. 96; Prokofiev: Piano concerto No. 3; Takemitsu: Cassiopeia.

Sunday, August 1

2?30 p.m. Shed. Daniel Barenboim, conductor, Pinchas Kukerman. Schubert: Overture to Rosamunde. Lalo: Symphonie espagnole. Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160
JUN 27 1971
New England Newsclip

RINGED by a battery of percussion instruments, Stomu Yamash'ta will perform Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with the B.S.O. at Tanglewood July 31.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JUL 31 1971
New England Newsclip

Conductor-pianist

Daniel Barenboim conducts the Boston Symphony tonight at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., then moves on to Saratoga Springs, N.Y., where he will direct the second program, on Thursday, Aug. 5, of the Philadelphia Orchestra's summer season there. The following evening, Aug. 6, Mr. Barenboim will play Beethoven's First Piano Concerto at Saratoga under the baton of Istvan Kertesz.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 49,250
JUL 30 1971
New England Newsclip

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins tonight at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun-treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. tonight in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir with music from the Renaissance, free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal takes place tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed.

Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the Boston Symphony tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Stomu Yamash'ta, one of today's foremost percussion virtuosi, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He's appeared in Europe's festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon, has also performed with the Boston Symphony.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday at 2:30 p.m. with Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Kukerman, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
JUL 24 1971
New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Lists Fifth Programs

The fifth week end of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday, July 30 at 9 p.m. in the Shed in Lenox.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun-treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la Russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. on Friday in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Week end Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal takes place Saturday, July 30 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. These Open Rehearsals, held each Saturday morning in the Shed, offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music. Seats are on sale the morning of the Rehearsal. Proceeds from the sale of tickets benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday, July 30 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion.

The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Stomu Yamash'ta, one of the foremost percussion virtuosi in music, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He has appeared in Europe at the Festivals at Aldeburgh, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Avignon. He has performed with the Boston Symphony on numerous occasions.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday, August 1 at 2:30 p.m. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Mr. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, takes place July 27. The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. Beginning at 6:30 p.m., simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

At 8:30 p.m., the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Boston Symphony associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, then conducts the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok. Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller, then conducts a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure."

70

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

JUL 29 1971 New England Newsclip

Barenboim Conducts — Zukerman Violin Soloist at Tanglewood

LENOX—The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins Friday evening, July 30, at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor, conducts Copland's Appalachian Spring, Ruggles' Sun-treader, Stravinsky's Scherzo a la russe, and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's Swan Lake.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 p.m. on Friday in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Open rehearsal takes place Saturday morning, July 30 at 10:30 a.m. in the shed. Seats are unreserved at $2.50 each and are on sale the morning of the Rehearsal. Proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Saturday evening July 30 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion. Program is Haydn's Symphony no. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's Cassiopeia, with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1 at 2:30 p.m. Mr. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie espagnole, with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

JUL 29 1971 New England Newsclip

People and events

Playwright donates books

Bridgewater resident and playwright Robert Anderson (''Tea and Sympathy,'' ''You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running'') has donated some of his works, including autographed copies of ''I Never Sang For My Father,'' to the town's book and bake sale.

The event, sponsored by the Friends of the Library in Bridgewater, will take place Saturday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Sunday from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Bridgewater Firehouse, Route 133.

In addition to fiction, non-fiction and children's books, three light fixtures and two sconces, circa 1926, from the remodeled library, will be sold.

Art auction Saturday

The Sisterhood of Temple Sholom in New Milford will sponsor its First Annual Art Auction on Saturday evening at 8:30 at the temple on Route 7, north of the traffic circle, in New Milford.

Original oils, acrylics, watercolors, lithographs, serigraphs, pen and ink, collage and gouache by American, European and Israeli artists will be offered.

Louis Toro, at ease in oils, watercolors or pen and ink and Norman Altman, whose intimate knowledge of the silk screen process has led to the development and production of unique serigraphs, are among the juried, award-winning American artists whose works will be shown.

Other artists include Rumanian Joseph Fahri whose works are exhibited at the Modern Museum of Art in New York and the Paris Museum; English-born Joseph Benskin, a former artist and designer for the British Broadcasting Co., who utilizes a blending of warm pastel colors to portray his landscapes and seacapes and Israeli artist Ella Ra-ayoni who paints with scissors instead of a brush and created detailed portraits, landscapes, still lifes, animals and abstracts using silks, cottons, laces and velvet.

The public is invited to attend the auction free of charge. The doors will open at 7:45 p.m. to permit an inspection of the paintings before the auction begins.

Robert Anderson

Grateful Dead to rock

The Grateful Dead will play for the second of four rock concerts sponsored by the New Haven Jaycees Saturday night at 8:15 at the Yale Bowl.

Rock enthusiasts may contact the Jaycees, 152 Temple St., New Haven for reservations, or purchase any available tickets the day of the concert at the Yale Bowl.

Janis, at Tanglewood

The fifth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood begins tomorrow evening at 9 in the Shed. Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program, including Copland's ''Appalachian Spring,'' Ruggles' ''Sun-treader,'' Stravinsky's ''Scherzo a la russe,'' and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's ''Swan Lake.''

The Weekend Prelude, at 7 tomorrow night in the Shed, features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance.

Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday night at 8:30 in the Shed. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third piano concerto, with piano soloist Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's ''Cassiopeia'' with percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon at 2:30. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to ''Rosamunde,'' Lalo's ''Symphonie Espagnole,'' with violin soloist Pinchas Zukerman and, concluding the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Mulhare stars at Westport

Edward Mulhare and Beatrice Straight will star in ''The Right Honorable Gentleman'' opening Monday night at the Westport Country Playhouse.

Tickets are available at the box office from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays and Sunday noon to 5 p.m.

Area teens on 4-H trip

Six area teenagers are among nine who are on a six-day camping trip to the Adirondack Mountain area of upstate New York.

John McLaughlin and Donald Lipsi of Danbury, Harold Pattison, Michael Toll and Peter VanSyckle of Newtown, and Frank Talerico of Southbury are among the young people who went to Capitol District 4-H Camp in Troy, N.Y. where they joined 4-H teens from that state for the remainder of the trip.

The teens will set up a permanent camp site on Hen Island on Raquette Lake and from there will explore the area. Some of their activities will include climbing nearby West Mountain, visiting via canoe Blue Mountain and Forked Lake, and exploring beaver dams and swamp area.

The strip will stress the study of ecology, working as teams to accomplish tasks, sensitivity to one another and the out-of doors, learning canoeing and basic camping skills.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 27 1971

Thomas to Conduct Tanglewood Concert

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts an all-orchestral program as the opening concert this weekend in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

* * *

The Friday evening concert at 9 p.m. includes Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Ruggles' "Sun - treader," Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la russe," and the Divertissement from Act 3 of Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake."

The weekend prelude, at 7 p.m. Friday in the Shed, presents the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance. The concerts are free to ticket-holders for the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony at 8:30 p.m. Saturday in the Shed with soloists Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia."

* * *

Yamash'ta, one of the foremost percussion virtuosi in music today, made his concert debut in 1963 performing Milhaud's Percussion concerto with the Osaka (Japan) Philharmonic. He has performed with the Boston Symphony on numerous occasions.

Daniel Barenboim is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Soloist is violinist Pinchas Zukerman. Barenboim conducts Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde," Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, with soloist Zukerman, and concluding the program Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the students of the Berkshire Music Center, takes place tonight. The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. Beginning at 6:30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House, and in the Tanglewood Tent.

* * *

At 8:30 p.m., the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Ozawa then conducts the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok. Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller, then conducts a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure."

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG. 2 1971

Barenboim Brilliant in Tanglewood Debut

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass. — Yesterday Daniel Barenboim made his first appearance this season at Tanglewood, leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in music by Schubert, Tchaikovsky and Lalo. Pinchas Zukerman was soloist in the Lalo "Symphonie Espagnole" for Violin and Orchestra.

Judging by the response of both the audience and orchestra to his efforts, this talented young musician is one of the real comers in the conducting field.

HIS READING of the Schubert Overture to "Rosamunde" had a well shaped lyric line as well as rhythmic vitality.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor is a good work for an outdoor festival concert with its brilliant orchestration, melodious thematic material and powerful climaxes. Mr. Barenboim's conception of this familiar symphony was very exciting without being overly melodramtic.

We thought that the famous Scherzo came off particularly well in the antiphonal passages between the plucked strings and woodwinds. This is a real "tour de force" for the strings. The Allegro con fuoco finale found the young conductor building climax upon climax, obtaining a "wow" finish at the end. This was Tchaikovsy without the maudlin sentimentality too often associated with his music.

PINCHAS ZUKERMAN, one of the fine younger violinists, played the solo part of the Lalo work with comprehensive mastery of its stylistic and technical problems. The Adagio was beautifully expressive and there was rhythmic grace as well as deft virtuosity in the Scherzando and Finale.

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000

AUG 2 1971

New England Newsclip

CAPACITY AUDIENCES AT MUSICAL FESTIVAL

Capacity audiences have been crowding the auditorium and the grounds at the Tanglewood Music Festival this summer, approving the program, the new seating arrangements, and the schedule of conductors.

Proving once again that the continuous fame and favoritism of the "three B's" is far from receding to the background because of Rock and Noise, tremendous ovations have greeted Seiji Ozawa's conducting of Bach's Brandenburg concertos and Magnificat, or the Bach suite conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, the Brahms tremendous evenings under the baton of William Steinberg, when the presentations included his Tragic and Academic Festival Overtures, the beloved piano concerto No. 2 when Vladimir Ashkenaze performed a superb and colorful rendition of this haunting and heart-stirring work and the Beethoven weekend, with William Steinberg conducting the Leonore overture, King Stephen overture, and the Fifth, Seventh and Third, (Eroica) symphonies, together with the Missa Solemnis and his violin concerto among them; and many of the other greats strewn throughout, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Hayden, Bartoc and Vivaldi.

With a half season gone, there are yet four weekends, that begin with the Friday weekend prelude at 7 P.M. and continue on into Sunday afternoons, and there is yet much to be heard. The seasons have stretched from the former five or six weeks in all, to the current eight, and it is just great that we are strategically located in this area to embrace so much, so near.

R. E. Houghton

Springfield Union 8/2/71

Some Surprises Served Audiences At Weekend Tanglewood Concerts

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The customers at Tanglewood were served a mildly surprising switch Sunday afternoon: A couple of energetic youths with longish hair presented a program of traditionalism. It was different Saturday.

Gilded Lily

Daniel Barenboim, 29, conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra with music by Schubert, Lalo and Tchaikovsky. His friend, Pinchas Zukerman, 23, was soloist for Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra, Opus 21.

The Lalo work is a show piece for virtuoso violinist; the final work on the program, Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, is a show piece for orchestra . . at least that's the way Barenboim seems to see it.

Sunday afternoon it was a gilded lily. Barenboim persuaded the obedient orchestra to build it higher and spread it wider than it deserves.

It is not a symphony that needs encouragement; it is already theatrical enough. Sunday, Barenboim's prodding caused more than a few of its moments of full-bodied abundance to become excessively lush.

Zukerman displayed a somewhat similar attitude toward his Lalo piece. He swooped into the beginning with supremely arrogant nonchalance bordering on disdain, as if he were playing an easy game for the kiddies.

Many Misses

But his overconfidence, if that is what it was, was misplaced. The first, second and fourth movements of the Lalo call for highly-skilled fiddle playing at breakneck speed, and Zukerman was spraying wrong notes everywhere. His tone, also, was uncommonly roungh in the low register.

The third movement, however, a serious, passion-filled, slow movement, was very effective. He played it with emotion, as if he were a well-schooled Hungarian gypsy, and made a good case for himself as a front-rank musician rather than simply virtuoso fiddler.

DANIEL BARENBOIM

Saturday night there was something for everyone — conservatives and radicals, intellectuals and romantics, fathers and sons . . .excuse me, Betty Friedan — mothers and daughters.

Seiji Ozawa led the orchestra with agile finesse through three musical works that are 180 years old (Haydn's Symphony No. 96,), 50 years old (Profofieff's Third Piano Concerto), and three months old (Toru Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" for solo percussionist and orchestra.

The Haydn was elegant, politely nice, delicately lacy, beautifully ephemeral.

The Profofieff was, in the hands of the soloist, Byron Janis, a tremendous display of reckless speed and icy passion.

Janis (and Ozawa) built it to a fever pitch of nervous momentum and rode it to a thunderous climax.

But since the Haydn and Profofieff are known quantities, let us spend out remaining space on the Takemitsu invention created last spring for the virtuoso percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta.

It is more concerned with reflecting that aspect of Cassiopeia's punishment, when she is tipped upside down in a basket in the heavens, than with the misbehavior that put here there.

And it reflects the lack of harmony and regular rhythm of the contemporary atonalists Varese and Webern.

The orchestra was rearranged into six mixed groups so that none of the players was sitting in his regular seat. In front at the edge of the stage was a rigging that supported dozens of percussion instruments, including many of unfamiliar Oriental and African origin.

The soloist was John Wyre, timpanist for the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, who was a late substitute for Yamash'ta who was obliged to complete a commitment at the Munich Festival.

The music, which lasted 15 minutes, induced a wide variety of response. Traditionalists rejected it because of its discord and chaos; modernists welcomed it for the same reasons; plain, open-minded listeners found much in it to dislike (arid passages of pure noise), and to like (delicate textures of Oriental bells, patterns of clever contrast, colorful surprises).

At its end, members of the audience could be seen scurrying for the exits shaking their heads in annoyed disbelief, while others crowded to the stage to shout their approval and help the little composer climb up to take a bow.

The degrees of acceptance and rejection were wide and freely expressed.

The week's attendance was 21,470. There were 4422 at Tuesday's Tanglewood on Parade, 4630 at Friday's concert; 2447 at Saturday morning's open rehearsal, 6495 at Saturday's concert and 7898 Sunday afternoon.

Tuesday night, Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops with Earl Wild as soloist for Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto.

Colin Davis will conduct a program of Schubert and Elgar Friday and a program of Mozart and Mahler Saturday with Judith Raskin soloist.

Sunday, Ozawa will conduct a program of music by Xenakis, Tchaikovsky and Beethoven, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist.

NIXON LAW FIRM PROBE

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Morris K. Udall, D-Arix., announced Sunday he will seek to determine whether there was anything illegal or unethical in the selection of President Nixon's old law firm to help handle a $250 million issue of Postal Service bonds.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 31 1971

New England Newsclip

Good Old Ruggles Shakes the Rafters At Tanglewood

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Good old Carl Ruggles shook the rafters in the great shed at Tanglewood Friday night; his venerable vibrations were recreated with a vengeance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the guidance of Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor.

The piece was "Sun-Treader," written in 1931 and heard for the first time at Tanglewood. Ruggles wasn't there in person; he is 95. But his spirit was almost palpable.

"Sun-Treader" is a 15-minute work that alternately sets your teeth on edge and promises calm, only to fray your nerves again.

It builds gigantic blocks of screaming discord wrenched out of the cosmos by brute force, subsides suddenly into low, lonely, mildly dissonant moans and wails, only to rise again in horrendous, chaotic crashes.

To hear Ruggles is an experience not necessarily pleasant, but possibly fun (like an adolescent horror movie) and certainly exciting.

Friday it made Copland's "Appalachian Spring," which preceded it, look pale and pallid in comparison, something like a medly of passages from Ferde Grofe and Leroy Anderson, which probably does it a disservice.

After intermission, Thomas led the orchestra through more new-old music: Tchaikovsky's divertissement from Act 3 of "Swan Lake" and Stravinsky's "Scherzo a la Russe."

The Stravinsky piece was a nice five minutes of crisp brass ensemble (accompanied by strungs, etc.) mostly in march time, which began as music for a war movie. It was neat and clever.

The Tchaikovsky ballet which followed for nearly a half hour offered, as might be expected, some beautiful harmonies. . .all those reliable sounds that can be counted on to send the listeners (there were 4630 Friday) home with peace and contentment.

The Berkshire Boy Choir, which this year is based at Amherst College instead of as heretofore, in the Berkshires, performed the 7 o'clock prelude program for perhaps 1500 early arrivals.

There were 10 pieces on its 50-minute program, the most impressive, in my view being those which called for antiphonal (two-choir) contrapuntal techniques.

There were 43 boys and 16 young men on the stage, and the sopranos were absolutely beautiful, a factor which may have adversely influenced the director, Allan Wicks because the sopranos were about all that could be heard except for occasional foundation from the baritones.

This deficiency in balance was the only real flaw requiring reporting, all other attributes being happy. There was much subtlety of inflection and expression, the starts and stops were, for the most part, clean, and the continuity was fluid and lyrical.

So the best memory from the performance is in the beautiful purity of the sound of the boy sopranos. It is a sound, I must confess, which doesn't move me, my strong preference being for having the same notes sung by females; but as boy choirs go, the Berkshire Choir Friday sounded as sweet and clean as any I have heard.

Tonight at 8.30, Seiji Ozaw will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program including Haydns Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto with Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" for solo percussionist and orchestra with John Wyre.

Sunday afternoon at 2.30, Daniel Barenboim lead the orchestra through Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde," Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra with Pinchas Zukerman, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

AUG 2 1971

New England Newsclip

Janis Plays Prokofieff at Tanglewood

Music Review

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Nothing in the Berkshire Music Festival's fifth weekend at Tanglewood could compare with the ovation that Byron Janis received Saturday night for his performance of Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony was Seiji Ozawa. Daniel Barenboim conducted yesterday afternoon. The violin soloist was Pinchas Zukerman in Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Friday night's concert was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Total attendance for the weekend was 21,470. This was 16,716 less than the previous weekend, when the conductors were William Steinberg and Leonard Bernstein.

Despite Janis' triumph, the Saturday night concert was no panacea.

Jazz Intrudes

About a mile from the Tanglewood music shed, a jazz concert was in progress at Music Inn. The sound carried strongly enough to create a mild battle of music.

The conflict was less irritating during the Boston Symphony's playing of Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" for solo percussionist and orchestra. But Prokofieff and jazz were opponents.

Whatever the reason for inflicting Takemitsu's concoction of sounds on the Tanglewood audience, it did nothing to put frosting on the Prokofieff that preceded it.

One was expected, presumably, to relate this clatter with extensive storytelling in the program book.

"Cassiopeia was a mythological queen, wife of Cepheus, Ethiopian King of Jappa. This lady has several dubious claims to fame."

So has Takemitsu's music.

Shortly after the initial caterwauling, percussionist John Wyre sprinted through the audience, striking sticks together. His destination on stage was a cage-like apparatus from which was hung an assortment of percussive appurtenances.

Wyre played these from kneeling, crouching and standing positions.

The orchestra was divided into sections, or gangs. They clanged, growled, clashed, moaned, screeched and squawked.

In all three movements of the Prokofieff Concerto, Janis played the brittle, stormy sequences with steely fingers. Rhythms were powerful. Phrasing was synonymous between soloist and orchestra. Emotional content was devoid of gush.

It was a fiery performance, under control (despite reports that the pianist was unusually nervous), and beautifully unified.

At times, precipitous tempos in the finale threatened to create problems, but they never really materialized.

Haydn's 96th Symphony, "Miracle," received a standard Boston Symphony performance, which is better than most. So was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, under Barenboim.

Swift movements of the Haydn were agile and disciplined. Ozawa conducted the minuet with the vigor of a band march. Tempo of the finale was compatible with brilliance, and there was little loss of articulation.

Barenboim is a methodical and slightly mechanical conductor. His thought was clear in the Tchaikovsky Symphony, and he adapted with insight to the styles of Schubert in the "Rosamunde" Overture and Lalo violin concerto.

The introduction to "Rosamunde" had breadth and a smooth transition to quiet expression in strings and reed solos. The active bulk of the overture was tuneful, too heavy in brass, generally brilliant with a race of Rossini flair.

Zukerman opened the Lalo in the spirit of bravura, with a little defective marksmanship in pitch. This tendency to sharp was pretty consistent.

The violinist produced a vibrant tone which Barenboim respected and balanced orchestrally. The "scherzando" was true to its dance style, flexible and personal.

Zukerman played the slow movement feelingly, with tonal warmth and some sharpness in top range. The finale received the benefit of dexterous technique, brilliant character, slight pitch defects and climactic drive.

PROGRAMS
Saturday night
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
Symphony No. 96 in D major, "Miracle" — Haydn
Piano Concerto No. 3 in C major, Opus 26 — Prokofieff
Byron Janis, pianist
"Cassiopeia" for solo percussionist and orchestra — Takemitsu
Sunday afternoon
Daniel Barenboim, conductor
Overture to "Rosamunde" — Schubert
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra, Opus 21 — Lalo
Pinchas Zukerman, violinist
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Opus 36 — Tchaikovsky

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,215

AUG 2 1971

Budding Young Artists Have Contrasting Styles

By BILL RICE

An opportunity to hear two budding young musicians and compare their somewhat contrasting approach to music was afforded at the Sunday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., when 28-year-old conductor, Daniel Barenboim, led a program featuring 23-year-old violinist, Pinchas Zuckerman.

While the program was enjoyable throughout, we felt it could have been improved upon by a little more showmanship from one, and a little less from the other.

We should point out that both young musicians gave an overall good account of themselves and seem destined to make their mark in the world of music judging from Sunday's performance.

The contrast in styles is somewhat surprising in view of the fact that the two are no strangers, having recorded and performed often together on previous occasions.

No Motion Economy

Barenboim is not a conductor who believes in economy of motion. This can be interpreted either as youthful zeal or an attempt at too much showmanship.

At any rate, it creates certain problems in a performance, even though many conductors have used such showmanship as an effective tool. We often found the young conductor calling for too much in the way of dynamics from the orchestra, not in the violin solo, but in the opening selection, Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture and the closing Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, by Tchaikovsky.

Thankfully, it wasn't always given. When fortes are constantly played like double fortes there isn't enough volume left from the orchestra when it is needed.

The Argentina-born Barenboim contrasts his very dramatic sweeping motions with almost imperceivable small ones. Again, we wondered if this was for precision, as should be the case, or for effect.

On the positive side, we found Barenboim's emotional interpretation of the Tchaikovsky to be well in order, and we have never heard the Boston Symphony brass sounding better.

Enthusiasm Evident

The conductor's enthusiasm for the music was generated to the orchestra and it was evident the Barenboim, also an accomplished pianist, was completely familiar with the scores. It isn't that the end result of his work is displeasing, it's just that we feel the same result, or better, could be achieved with less theatrics.

Zukerman, who was born in Israel, cannot yet be considered a mature artist, but he is certainly headed in the right direction.

In contrast to the showmanship of Barenboim, Zukerman's violin playing is somewhat reserved, almost shy.

While he posseses a strong tone in all registers, enhanced by a full resonant vibrato, his approach to Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, his vehicle for the day, was somewhat matter of fact and lacking in expressiveness. His technique and intonation were flawless, and the most demanding passages were played with a smooth eveness that comes only with confidence.

Has Great Future

Zukerman has a great future if he continues to develop as an artist, and there is no reason to think that he won't. One of the pleasures of concert going is to look back in years to come and be able to say "I heard so and so, back when."

We found his interpretation of the third movement, "Andante", to be the best of the four. Here his great tone and control really seemed to jell.

For those who would like to compare notes with this reviewer, both artists will appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra this Thursday at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

Barenboim will conduct a program consisting of Liszt's "Les Preludes," Brahm's "Symphony No. 4" and the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, with Zukerman as soloist.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 2 1971

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony plays Haydn at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — At the Boston Symphony concert Saturday at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa provided yet another demonstration of his flair for 18th Century music. The work this time was Haydn's symphony No. 96, of which Ozawa conducted a performance showing that he relished its point and joke, and that he speaks the language in which they are made.

Next came the piano concerto No. 3 by Prokofiev, a delightful work except for an episode in the finale of pseudo-Rachmaninoff, where I think the composer is offering false coin.

The brilliant soloist was Byron Janis, reported after surgery to be fully recovered from the bursitis that for years had been a hindrance to his career and that for some time had kept him off the concert platform altogether.

Illness did keep the Japanese percussionist Stomu Yamash'ta from participating in the performance of "Cassiopeia," a work recently finished for him by Toru Takenitsu. Yamash'ta's place was taken at nine days' notice by John Wyre, principal percussionist of the Toronto Symphony and himself a composer.

Yamash'ta is said to be not only a bravura player of extraordinary capacities but also someone who puts on a remarkable show. Wyre is a virtuoso, and the professionalism that has enabled him to undertake this taxing assignment is greatly to be praised; but he is a quiet, unassuming performer. Takenitsu seems to have written for the showman even more than for the virtuoso, and with the show taken away, "Cassiopeia" was unmasked as inane. This raises an ugly issue, one, though, that cannot be escaped. I do not believe that "Cassiopeia" would be given the time of day on the program of an American orchestra if it were not salable as Japanese exoticism.

But there is one more point. "Cassiopeia" had little chance to generate atmosphere on Saturday night because, like the Prokofiev earlier, it was constantly disturbed by the distant though distinct sound of rock. I can't imagine why the source could not be found and stopped, but I do know that by not insuring listening conditions, the Boston Symphony management failed to meet its obligations to the musicians it engages and to its paying public.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 2 1971

Sweet and Proper Music for a Sunday

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Sunday afternoon, ever since pre-war (2, that is) days and New York Philharmonic broadcasts, has been the proper and traditional time for proper and traditional classical music in America. Sunday at Tanglewood was no exception. On the bill of fare was "Rosamunde," by Schubert, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra," and Tchaikowsky's, Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Opus 36.

Featured soloist in the Lalo was Pinchas Zuckerman the Israeli Violinist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by his contemporary and friend, Daniel Barenboim the indefatigable and paripatetic pianist and conductor.

THESE YOUNG MEN drew the sugar from this sweet work down to the last crystal. The music is romantic, melodic and shot through with Central European and Romany predelictions and disciplines.

It is almost the definitive example of what violinists, of the virtuoso and bravura school anyhow, were playing at the end of the 19th century and for a lazy afternoon on the green it completed an already pleasant ambiance.

Zuckerman is surely one of the fine young (23) fiddle players around and believe me there are lots of them. I don't know from whence they come, but every season they come out of the woodwork and amaze us with their talents and dedication.

BARENBOIM, 28, IS a compulsive performer, whether as a conductor, pianist, or accompanist, and it might cost him in the long run but for what we will simply have to wait and see. There is no question about his talent, it is prodigious, but conducting is a long and scholarly task and there are only 24 hours in the day.

His reading of the Tchaikowsky was more than competent but nonetheless superficial. Certainly out the someone is saying, "Of course, it's superficial, it's Tchaikowsky." This type of arrogance, that has found considerable currency among people that should know better notwithstanding, there is more to the music than that.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Barenboim conducts BSO with skill

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

LENOX — Daniel Barenboim, who returned to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Sunday, has been criticized, not without some justification, for "practicing" on the major orchestras of the world instead of developing his emerging conductorial skills on some less exposed orchestra. In this concert of Schubert, Lalo, and Tchaikovsky, I'm pleased to report that there was none of the half-bakedness which has characterized some of the pianist-conductor's previous performances and which has earned him this reputation. On the contrary, he displayed the maturity, sensitivity, and discipline which one had glimpsed in another medium — that is, the best of his Beethoven Sonata discs.

Barenboim has recently recorded the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony and, perhaps, because of that, has made a special study of this work. That, indeed, is how it sounded Sunday. A performance of structural cohesion and wonderful excitement that comes as the result of careful rethinking.

This is a piece which is so familiar that it can become for many a shapeless wash of sound with lots of semi-hysterical emotionalism. Barenboim forced one to really listen to it again and to acknowledge the sense and logic of its construction. He understands and exploits the nervous quality of this music — the generation of expectation between themes and the heightened intensity of each return — and this made for a gripping musical experience which you may not have had with the piece for a long time.

Barenboim exercised the same care during the first half performances of Schuture and Lalo's once-a-war-horse-and-now-a-rarity "Symphonie Espagnole." The violin soloist in the latter was Pinchas Zukerman.

A flashy virtuoso piece without much to say, the Lalo works only if played with slick, toss-it-off brillance. Zukerman is not this kind of violinist. His intonation is rather thin, the dynamics unvarying, and the pitch tending to flatness.

Tanglewood In Review

Demanding a superlative orchestral background and conductor which the Boston Symphony can well boast Seiji Ozawa conducted the extreme contrasts between Sergey Prokofiev's third piano concerto, and Toru Takemitsu's Cassiopeia for solo percussionist and orchestra were noted through the medium of two of the top superiative performers recently at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

When Byron Janis in his return engagement there, but in his first performance of the Prokofiev, and John Wyre, percussionist, performed in the Takemitsu composition it was a progression of historic musical dates and international composers. The program began with a Haydn symphony composed in 1791, the "Miracle", or 96th, in its first presentation at Tanglewood then proceded to the modern and currently beloved Prokofiev, concerto, completed in 1921 and concluded with the avant garde Cassiopeia, written only three months ago—a varied program rarely offered in one sitting. It takes a mature musical digestion to assimilate all three without a rumble, but according to applause, and repeated curtain calls for conductor, soloists, composer (Takemitsu) who was called to the stage, as well as orchestral body the augmented audience in spite of rain threatening literally ate it up.

Byron Janis was at his height, to a struggling amateur, it seems incredible that fingers move so swiftly over the keyboard, and come forth with such astounding power; even to the semi-pro, it was an amazing feat to witness and an elated experience to hear. The Russian composer himself best describes his composition thus: "both the piano and orchestra have a good deal to say . . . as the chief theme and second subject develop with increased billiance, ending with an exciting cresendo. The piano and orchestra discourse in a quiet meditative fashion, between variations of brilliant figures, delicate chordal embroidery on the piano, while in the finale, there is a good deal of argument with differences of opinion as regards key. The piano keeps up to the caustic humor of the work; and ends with a brilliant coda. . ."

Variety At Work

It, as is well known, is an excitingly varied work; in the hands of Janis, himself a genius—it is electrifying.

It is almost difficult to adjust to the strange sounds, the continued change of tone, instrument, combination, tempo of the Japanese work which followed, even with an intermission between—yet in its surprise elements, its wierd, forceful, haunting, stormy moderate, eery, and enormous commotion it evokes, it concludes into a "pianissimo pianissimo," fading off into nothingness, as the final soft note floats away; The Percussionist himself must be a genius to accomplish much of the playing which is done on the strange and unfamiliar instruments, while on his knees or from under the contraptions themselves; bars of steel stretched and bent, antique cymbals, Trinidad steel drum, three Almglocken (German cow bells) metallic wind chime, two gongs, two tam tams, two sizzle cymbals, African karimba, tambourine played with the knuckle, hit shaken and flapped, wood blocks, long drum, temple blocks wooden plate 5 boobam four roto-tom, three tom toms and two foot bass drums, are all added to the usual orchestral instruments, played in solo, groups, and against the added sound. The theme is from the ancient story of Cassiopeia, wife of Cepheus, Ethiopian King of Joppa. Takemitsu, considered one of the best known of the younger group of Japanese composers has been widely performed in the states and in Europe; Copland considers him one of the outstanding composers of our time. Any who have attended Expo 70 can understand why he was chosen to direct the Space Theatre in the Steel Pavilion there. The work, strongly influenced by Debussy, who was himself influenced by the oriental systems of music, is concerned with space and sound — suggested from the story that concerns the stars, the heavens, Cassiopeia's stituation in the sky . . . Once hearing, you won't be happy until you hear it again—and I strongly suggest a first hearing—if you would be aware add awake to today's sound and its tremendous possibilities.

—R. E. Houghton

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
AUG 3 1971

Barenboim Elevates Tanglewood Concert

By LAURIE MODELL

Sunday afternoon's Tanglewood concert provided the listener with the chance to observe a conducting style completely in contrast to anything that had preceded it this summer.

The conductor was Daniel Barenboim and the works performed, all fairly standard repertoire, were Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra with Pinchas Zukerman, guest soloist and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Barenboim appeared onstage for the Schubert Overture with a brisk, no-nonsense manner, glared at audience latecomers, and suddenly the shed literally burst into music.

That seems to be basic to Mr. Barenboim's style: a briskness and energy that can bring truly electric performances from orchestras. The tendency to merely "mark time" occasionally, especially during solos, that certainly can be seen in the greatest of conductors, does not seem to appear in Mr. Barenboim. This total concentration made the Schubert a delightful experience: it had a lightness that was at the same time never trite.

Mr. Barenboim has a sharp, clearly readable use of the baton and his style is marked by strong rhythmic accentuation (without heaviness) that can be easily anticipated from his hand movement. He is given to frequent use of wide gestures that involve his entire body but that seldom appear melodramatic or superficial, and in his case, are perfectly in keeping with the mood of the music.

The second work performed, the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole, demonstrated what complete understanding between soloist and conductor can (but seldom does) produce.

Mr. Kuckerman gave a lively, interesting performance of this late 19th century virtuoso piece, that managed to keep the virtuosity under control and kept the melodies in the foreground. Also interesting to note was the abundance of communication between Mr. Zuckerman and the conductor. Mr. Barenboim carefully guided the orchestra in the violinist's path, and at no time did they lag behind his extremely brisk tempos or lose sight of his conception of the work. Pinchas Zuckerman's vibrato, while quite fast, seemed to lend itself to the gypsy quality of the work, and his tone, despite a certain harshness in the very low tones, was rich and dramatic.

What we had thought was total involvement from Mr. Barenboim up to this point in the concert however, proved to be nothing in comparison with the brilliance of his conducting in the Tchaikovsy 4th.

Typical were the carefully articulated, somber brass notes that opened the work (at which point the energetic symbol crashes were a decided intrusion). In such an exciting performance, it is hard to point to any one passage as outstanding when all parts of it seem to take one's breath away, but special mention should be made of the oboe solo played with a melancholy sadness, by Ralph Gomberg, that opened the second movement, and also outstanding was the ensemble work in the pizzicato third movement — never has there been such plucking in unison. It was entirely a very musical afternoon.

Next week the Boston Symphony will perform works by Hindemith, Schuller, Bruckner, Mozart, Elgar, H. Wood and Dvorak. Conductors are Colin Davis and William Steinberg.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
AUG 3 1971 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

A Weekend for Conductors at Tanglewood

By Diane Foster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

The past weekend at Tanglewood featured three young and prominent conductors leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in several first performances.

Friday evening's concert, directed by BSO associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, featured a serious and substantial piece of music oddly juxtaposed with two ballet scores and incidental theater music. Carl Ruggles' "Sun-treader," which received its first performance at the Berkshire Festival, is among Deutsche Grammophon's initial release of albums by the BSO and (paried with Ives' "Three Places in New England".) is Mr. Thomas' first recording with the orchestra.

"Sun-treader" is eighteen minutes of stunning potency. Scored for a large orchestra, its long lines contrast occasional delicacy with predominantly dense and intense sound. Its tensions and climaxes are brilliant to the point of being terrifying, especially as directed by Mr. Thomas.

Reflected Brilliance

It was, in fact, the conductor, not the music nor the orchestra, that inspired the applause after the performance. Mr. Thomas obviously ignites his orchestral fuel.

Even the programmatic music of Copland in "Appalachian Spring" and of Tchaikovsky in the Divertissement from Act III of "Swan Lake" (first performance at the Berkshire Festival) glowed from the blaze. Particularly radiant were the solists in the Tchaikovsy and the sustained string tone at the end of the Copland, although the violin section as an ensemble was ragged.

Scherzo a la Russe by Stravinsky, another first perofrmance at the Berkshire Festival, charms with its unpretentious, robust festivity; surprises with its abrupt ending. A small work, it is the only piece by the late composer scheduled for this summer's weekend festival concerts. Whatever the reason, it is inexcusable that Stravinsky, who died on April 6, will receive no special commemoration by the BSO at Tanglewood this summer.

Takemitsu's 'Cassiopeia'

On Saturday Night, Seiji Ozawa conducted the first performance by the Boston Symphony of "Cassiopeia" for solo percussion and orchestra by Toru Takemitsu. Based on the tale of the mythological Ethiopian queen, "Cassiopeia" was written for Stomu Yamashita as soloist. He was originally scheduled to perform the work with the BSO but was indisposed and replaced by John Wyre.

"Cassiopeia", notes the avant-garde Japanese composer who was present in the audience, is dramatic as well as theatrical. In both space and sound it surrounds the percussionist with various groups of orchestral instruments and it exploits, builds, and contrasts the resulting sound combinations.

It is indeed theatrical. The soloist, beating wooden drum sticks together, entered the stage from the audience and crouched into his cage of hanging instruments, among which were an African karimba, a Trinidad steel drum, German cowbells, five boo-bam, and four roto-tom. The orchestra, which stressed bell and chime sonorities, explored such techniques as hitting the bell of the clarinet with the palm of the hand.

Theatrical Ending

The spectable of performance almost tends to dominate this music, for it is interesting in a detached rather than involved sort of way. Mr. Ozawa was marvelously dramatic and theatrical at the end. As the sound faded, his outstretched arm eased lower and lower and kept dropping until it finally reached the side of his body — several seconds after the sound had disappeared. For once, the audience did not clap before the end of the piece.

Mr. Ozawa prefaced this performance with Haydn's Symphony No. 96 in D, the "Miracle," and Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 in C with Bryon Janis as soloist. The Haydn was balanced and texturally transparent, but it seemed slightly heavy. Perhaps a faster tempo in the finale, vivace assai, would have ended it in a lighter vein. Better intonation from the notorious brass section of the BSO definitely would have improved an already good performance.

The Prokofiev received excellent treatment from both soloist and orchestra. Mr. Janis has the temperature, technique, and stamina required for Prokofiev, and Mr. Ozawa provided attentive orchestral accompaniment. At the beginning, the conductor had a problem with collaboration because the pianist did not look at him, but the difficulty was merely momentary.

Barenboim's Lalo

Daniel Barenboim was conductor on Sunday afternoon for the Overture to Rosamunde by Schubert, Symphonie Espagnole by Lalo, and Symphony No. 4 in F minor by Tchaikovsky. Of these, the Lalo was a first performance at the Berkshire Festival.

BYRON JANIS

DANIEL BARENBOIM

The Symphonie Espagnole has five movements, the third of which, an intermezzo, is usually and for some unknown reason omitted in performance. This performance was no exception. Since the intermezzo balances the tempo proportions of the work — allegro non troppo, allegro molto, allegretto non troppo, andante, and allergro — one would expect to hear a really complete performance at a festival such as the Berkshire.

The Symphonie Espagnole was influenced by the flaming technique and seductive, sensuous tone of the famous Spanish violin virtuoso, Pablo de Sarasate, who premiered the work. Sunday's soloist, Pinchas Zuckerman, had moments of such technique and tone, but he also had moments with scratchy intonation. Similarly, some passages, as in the andante, were beautifully expressive, while others could have been more fully developed.

Sensible Brilliance

The orchestral accompaniment was good, though one got the feeling that Mr. Barenboim was not as attuned to his soloist as Mr. Ozawa was to his the previous concert.

Conducting without score, Mr. Barenboim elicited a well-definied and sensibly brilliant Tchaikovsky Fourth from the BSO. The rather angular interpretation of the first movement suited the alternation between the results "fate,' theme and the expressive content. The pizzicato ostinato of the Scherzo was lovely in shape and tone, and even the brasses, having regained their composure, produced some fine sounds.

The Tchaikovsky Symphony summarized the theatrical, dramatic, expressive, and fresh — in sound if not in performance — music that characterized the weekend.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 6,550

AUG 5 1971

Tam Tams, Tom Toms Can't Outdo Rock

Louisa Kreisberg

By LOUISA KREISBERG
WRN Staff Writer

A funny thing happened to Seiji Ozawa at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. Saturday night.

The Japanese-born conductor was half-way through Haydn's "Miracle" Symphony (No. 96 in D) when the amplified sounds of rock 'n roll began competing with all music below a mezzoforte.

The westerly winds continued to blow rock sounds over the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloist Byron Janis during the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 3 in C.

But the real invasion came during the performance of "Cassiopeia," by contemporary composer Takemitsu.

The "Cassiopeia" called for a solo percussionist surrounded by an unusual group of instruments, including Trinidad steel drum, Almglocken (German cow bells) wind chime, gongs, tam tams, African karimba, timpani, tambourine, steel sheet, wood blocks, log drum, temple blocks, boo-bam, roto-tom, tom toms and foot bass drums.

With these percussive rarities, the soloist was to carry on a conversation with the orchestra as well as in solitude.

The sounds ranged from subtle to sensational. The crucial ingredient for the listener was concentration, for with the slightest distraction, the whole pattern of the piece could be lost.

Again, the rock 'n' roll arrived like an alien without a passport in a hostile country. This time the sound met the fury of the audience and some members of the orchestra, now clearly discomfited by the competition.

One cellist, for example, spun around with a "What the Hell is that?" look on his face, strained for awhile, then slumped into his chair, his hands opened helplessly, his head bowed and shaking.

Ozawa, hands flailing and long black hair flying, seemed mindful of what old Satchel said "Don't look back. Something may be gaining on you."

Totally committed to the work at hand, he finished the concert with the rock music hot on his heels.

THE INCIDENT had more than passing significance for the festival which lately has become a freeway where sounds and crowds regularly collide.

The Boston Symphony's rival Saturday was the Byrds, a popular recording group whose directions are country and folk with a big beat.

The Byrds had been booked by the Lenox Arts Center just around the corner, but had the schedule permitted, Tanglewood might have presented the group in its own pop series.

For 34 years, traditionalists have been coming to Tanglewood to hear "their kind" of music. But in the past few years, the festival has been booking separate, side-by-side rock and pop concerts.

The turnouts have been astounding. When Sly and the Family Stone performed a few weeks ago, every seat in the open-sided "big shed" was filled and thousands of listeners dotted the lawn.

The popular events have helped pay for those Haydn-Prokofieff-Takemitsu programs that cost so much to produce.

With the inclusion of rock acts a new kind of listener has come, one for whom the music is less relevant than the act of making the scene, of being there.

The rock audience goes to festivals to become part of a social milieu, to feel at peace and at one with innumerable others who share the same attitudes. But the crowds are not always controllable, and gate crashing has been a repeated violation.

ROCK EVENTS at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center have produced similar side effects. Early in the season, the management gave notice that individuals caught attempting to gain accesss to performances without paying admission would be arrested and charged with criminal trespass, third degree, a Class B misdemeanor. If convicted, they'd be subject to a $500 fine and three months in jail and would have a permanent criminal record.

At Tanglewood, the hedges that surround the arena of activity have been broken through so often the lawn maintenance crew can't repair the damage. The festival's management has limited advertising of rock concerts to the Lenox area. Such outlets as Ticketron and metropolitan daily newspapers have been studiously avoided in an attempt to limit the size of crowds.

Ironically, a solid block of ticket-holders has visited festivals in order to watch the growth of an important art form. But talking to a number of serious music students at Tanglewood, I drew the inference that they would prefer to hear rock music in a concert hall with a capacity of not over 3,000 and good acoustics.

They do not relish playing the role of human magpies responding to musical sonic booms. And they find it unpleasant indeed to contemplate a future in which festivals like Tanglewood will be a synonym for circus.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Rain Can't Dampen Tanglewood Enthusiasm

By Martha deB. Beaver

Weather may have dampened attendance total 21,470 at the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, but nothing seemed to dampen the spirits of the unquenchables who cast aside the petty inconveniences of teary elements, determined to get their fill of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its kaleidoscope of guest conductors.

The audience of 7,898 at Sunday's concert applauded and bravoed every pause, and, we hope unwittingly, approved 29-year-old Daniel Barenboim's sullen stalk offstage when some of their cohorts straggled in slowly and noisily after intermission.

It was childish of Barenboim who only compounded the latecomers' rudeness. More seasoned conductors meet this ignorance and command eventual silence by assuming a dignified forebearance. And we've never heard any shout "Quiet!" as the youthful director did when he took up his baton at his return.

The program opened with Schubert's delicious Overture to "Rosamunde, crisp and delightful reading, each section unfolded varying tender joyousness and with vigorous appeal. The only one of 11 separate pieces written in five days for a rather unimpressive drama, it had been composed three years previous for another theatre offering.

After only two performances of the entire work in 1823, the overture lay in obscurity until it was unearthed 44 years later by two English musicians, Sir George Grove and Arthur Sullivan.

Barenboim started his directing with curiously stiff-armed gestures, his upper body angular and unyielding, but it didn't seem to prevent the orchestra from responding with a fluent lyrycism when passages indicated.

Youth matched youth in dominant roles, with the appearance of Israeli-born violinist, 23-year-old Pinchas Zukerman, for a masterful performance of Edouard Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

Second of Lalo's extended works for violin and orchestra, it was composed for, and premiered by, the phenomenal Pablo de Sarasate, accounting for its immediate popularity, which continues over the years, and is part of every ambitious violinist's repertoire.

As engaging as the Donatello cherub he resembles (at least from a distance) Zukerman's playing suffered no lack of substance. In the preliminary tossing about of the first theme by soloist and orchestra, he showed a youthful assurance, almost nonchalant, but clearly backed by serious study, with a deeply resonant tone that even on the E-string, carried with amazing clarity during pianissimo passages.

Although placement was always secure, proper intonation didn't always follow, obvious through an immediate admustment. It would have been better to allow the slight difference, rather than draw attention to the change.

Barenboim controlled the orchestra with sensitive empathy, the quickly reached moments of unison at the end of rhythmically varied phrases precisely attained.

That part of the Andante when the orchestra gives over to the soloist's rhapsodic invention was particularly impressive, the sudden cessation of its tones leaving only the violin emerging clear and strong.

Here the fine melodic thread between soloist and musicians remained unbroken throughout.

Usually omitted, The Scherzando is a delight with its brisk lyrical waltz theme for solo violin against winds, soon offering a triplet figure echoed by the violin after a sprightly mid-section. Its quiet close of four high repeated notes was exquisitely intoned by Zukerman.

Spanish inspiration is nowhere more evident than in the impassioned Finale, its saltarello-like theme for solo violin dominating the whole.

Zukerman reflected both the gaiety and sensuousness of its melodies with a suavity and understanding far beyond his years, and with a virtuosity that encompassed the melodic flights with ease, though slips showed through occasionally, especially in high trills.

But then, it was a humid day, and fingers can slide beyond intention, and cause even greater havoc in a less talented player.

The Tschaikovsky fourth was luminous and exciting, marked with a wide range of color and nuances the young conductor outlined with more relaxed yet vigorous mien than the opening Schubert.

For its sixth weekend concert, Tanglewood will see Colin Davis directing Friday night's 9 o'clock

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Music students visit Tanglewood

DANBURY — Forty-six members of the Danbury Little Symphony Orchestra and summer string classes of the Danbury Music Centre occupied front section seats Saturday for an open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

The audience was treated to a three-hour program of Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture; Lalo's Symphonie espagnole; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 and Takemitsu's Cassiopeia.

Pinchas Zukerman, 22-year-old violin soloist in the Lalo offering, held the Music Centre's teen-age violin students spellbound with his skill, sensitive interpretation and most of all, his relaxed manner. Only a fellow violin player could appreciate the many hours and years of practice that could bring Zukerman to the exciting heights of musicianship which he displayed in the his solo work.

The conductor of the orchestra for the Schubert, Lalo and Tchaikovsky numbers, Daniel Barenboim, also a young musician, delighted the Music Centre group with his total involvement with the orchestra and music he was conducting.

The open-sided shed at Tanglewood and the loud thunderstorm provided the perfect setting for the premiere performance of the modern Takemitsu composition. Seiji Ozawa was conductor and Stomu Yamash'ta, soloist with bells, chimes, clappers and sticks.

The Music Centre students were accompanied by John Burnett, director of the Little Symphony and the summer string classes, and by Dr. Elizabeth Dominy of the Music Centre.

J.G.

TANGLEWOOD WEEKEND

Tanglewood, July 30
By M.K.B.

The program by the BSO at Tanglewood Friday evening was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and began with Copland's Appalachian Spring. This performance contained all of the excitement and moods of a beautiful spring and was most enjoyable.

The only reason evident for the performance of Carl Ruggles' Sun-Treader, however, was the fact that Mr. Thomas is a very good friend of Mr. Ruggles, for the music sounded as if it were the sound track for a mediocre outer-space movie. Stravinsky's Scherzo a la Russe was like a breath of cool fresh air on a warm muggy evening. The Divertissement from Act III of Swan Lake by Tchaikovsky was well played but lacked continuity without the visual effects of the ballet itself. Mr. Thomas' performance this evening was much more impressive than when I first saw him conduct. He has great potential but still lacks experience and maturity.

The real joy of the evening began at 7 o'clock and lasted only one hour, but that hour brought one of the most exciting performances I have ever heard. The Berkshire Boy Choir under the direction of Allan Wicks sang with such clarity and quality of tone and magnificent control that one might have been in heaven listening to the angels! Oh, the discipline and hours of practice that went into this marvelous performance!

Saturday, July 31
By J.H.

All who were in attendance Saturday night have traversed the void to the heavenly basket which imprisons the mysterious queen Cassiopia. They have heard her cries of grief, her bursts of anger. They have been moved to the music of the spheres which surrounds her repose. They have been set apart.

All this not by light shows or dubious chemicals, but by one of the most beautiful, moving works in the huge, chaotic literature of the avant garde. Japanese composer Toru Takemitsu was present for a stunning performance of his Cassiopia for solor percussionist and orchestra conducted, appropriately enough, by Seiji Ozawa. The soloist, John Wyre, had the necessary dancer's grace to supply the intended visual element and the musical ability to perform it.

The work is a happy blend of Japanese and Western musical cultures. It contains all of the delicacy and mysticism of Japanese music but is made more accessible to American hearers by its Western motivic usage, scales, and harmonic content.

The program opened with a musical, if under-rehearsed, reading of Haydn's Symphony no. 96 in D. Of special note was the lovely oboe solo in the trio. Following this, pianist Byron Janis and Mr. Ozawa displayed fine teamwork in a truly exciting, cohesive performance of Prokofiev's Concerto no. 3 in C.

Both Mr. Janis and composer Takemitsu received well-deserved standing ovations.

Sunday, Aug. 1
By J.H.

The Boston Symphony put in a day's work of which to be proud for conductor Daniel Barenboim. Mr. Barenboim's direction is clear, economical, and disciplined. His musical ideas are sound and he gets the orchestra to express them with unanimity. Some of the best ensemble playing of the season was heard Sunday.

From the gentle swells of the opening adagio through the big, joyful but delicate allegro, Schubert's Overture to Rosamunde there was a fine blending of laughter and lyricism. Loud passages, in which many conductors let go of the reins, were always controlled by Mr. Barenboim.

Less successful was Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra. The accompaniment was fine, but the work is literally carried by the solo violin, which in this case, except in the lovely andante, fell flat. Violinist Pinchas Zukerman turned in a weak, unmusical solo performance; often out of tune, out of tone.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony, on the other hand, was a revelation. There is some fine detail in this piece which is often ignored by conductors; and, if it is given as thoughtful a reading as Mr. Barenboim's, lo and behold, we discover that the Russian romantic did have a plan. The symphony is usually thrilling, in this case, it was also good.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 2 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Review

No Treasure Troves at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE THREE weekend concerts at Tanglewood employed three conductors, no one of which opened up his treasure chest of fastidiousness, if he possessed one. Yesterday afternoon the program ended on a pitch of noisy excitement as Daniel Barenboim brought the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony to a close after an inflexibly thunderous performance. Only rarely did he depart from a demand for all force from the orchestra. He did show a keen sensitivity after the majestic introduction when he led into the exposition at a noticeably moderate tempo, and he showed his respect for the orchestra when he let the oboe sing the Canzona on his own without attempting to beat and shape his solo. The famous pizzicato scherzo moved along at a sedentary pace.

Barenboim had shown his whole bag of conductorial tricks already in the gentle Schubert overture to "Rosamunde," so that he had little gestural ammunition left when he got to the really emotional agitation of the afternoon. And to complete the picture, to Pinchas Zukerman's wistful Andante in the Lalo "Symphonie Espagnole," Barenboim had the subtlety of a tortoise.

* * *

ZUKERMAN, however, in spite of the overhanging orchestral cliffs, stood out in dazzling sunlight in the four movements of the concerto he played, displaying a wizardly virtuosity and a tense passion. The 23-year-old violinist played with instrumental mastery, but above that there was radiant insight in the melodic moments and secure pyrotechnics throughout the sparkling passages.

There is no violin music which "lies" so well in the hand as Lalo's. In this sense his "Symphonie" ranks with the Bach solo violin sonatas even though written a century and a half later and in the expressive grace and piquant themes of his day in France. For a violinist with the innate talent of a Zukerman, the involved phrases practically fall into place with effortless impregnability.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT, Seiji Ozawa played Haydn, Prokofieff and the music of a fellow countryman of his, Toru Takemitsu, who was born in 1930, five years before his colleague conductor, Ozawa.

Ozawa batted for better than .666. He began with a pedestrian Haydn symphony, No. 96, in D, in which the only illumination was provided by a remarkably deft luftpause in the trio of the Menuet by oboist Ralph Gomberg. In spite of the reduced orchestra employed, it was still heavy.

Byron Janis gave a galvanic performance of the percussive Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 3 in C. There was a mercurial character to his astronautical flights on the keyboard, tempered on the few instances Prokofieff provides with a softly padded, sustained, more dulcet line.

* * *

THE SENSATION of the evening came after intermission when "Cassiopeia," a piece for solo percussionist and orchestra, by Takemitsu was played with John Wyre as the soloist. The orchestra's disposition was completely altered from the conventional manner of seating. Indeed, the pattern was not easily discernible except that smaller units within the larger ensemble were able to play in antiphonal sequences.

Whitestone

John Wyre plays menagerie of percussive instruments in "Cassiopeia" by Takemitsu.

A device similar to a display in a gift shop was placed stage center on which were hung all sorts of balls, gourds, and articles which could be struck or stroked to produce sounds. In addition, there were a variety of drums on the floor within the "cage" in which Wyre stationed himself.

On one hearing, it did not become evident that there was a musical idea being developed. The sounds were novel and abstract, pleasing and rewarding, warm and rich, and obviously the result of a disciplined and fertile imagination. While the music moved forward continuously, there were valleys of repose from which ascents moved to new sound "happenings," most agreeable tone pictures without meaning being superficially apparent. The composer was called to the stage from his seat in the audience and was accorded enthusiastic appreciation.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT'S program was a potpourri, with all the ingredients, be it stated, of estimable substance. Michael Tilson Thomas played Copland and Ruggles for the first half of the evening to make a very interesting contrast between the product of two of our American senior composers. Ruggles at near 95 is a quarter century older than Copland. Both examples date from so long ago that one begins to question where "contemporary" begins and ends.

There is an especial significance to Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring." It was commissioned by the late Pittsfield musical philanthropist, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, and was first performed, as a ballet, on her 80th birthday in the auditorium she donated to the nation in the Library of Congress in Washington. It was intended as the basis of a dance episode for Martha Graham. A primitive farmhouse was erected on the small Washington stage and an unreliable memory suggests that the structure was a skeleton, only the framework being utilized, but it suited the stark nature of Copland's concentrated music perfectly.

* * *

THE BACKGROUND of the composition has special Berkshire relevance. Copland spent a good share of his year in the Berkshires in that era and used as a theme in his suite a melody which the late Shaker authority, Edward Deming Andrews, had compiled in his book, "The Gift To Be Simple." Andrews collaborated on the book with the late Conrad Held, at that time violist of Mrs. Coolidge's South Mountain Quartet.

Louis Horst conducted the premiere. The original score called for but a dozen or more musicians. In the small pit in Washington the cellist on that occasion was Howard Mitchell, who later became conductor of the National Symphony. In the little Graham dance troupe was Nina Fonaroff, later to be dance instructor at the Pittsfield Community Music School. But Copland's music lent itself ideally to the narrative Miss Graham proceeded to dance.

Copland starts with a very sparse, seven introduction. A Thomas Benton picture comes to mind. He quickly proceeds into an explosive, semireligious fury which, with a telling detail of orchestration, he makes doubly effective by the vigorous striking of a xylophone with the piano and strings. The extreme contrasts were achieved by Thomas with an overzealousness which, however, was acceptable and graphic.

* * *

CARL RUGGLES' "Sun-Treader" dates from 25 years before Copland's suite, but whereas Copland's polyphony is transparent, Ruggles' is dense and thick. His method, however, yields to his purpose, and a message comes through. It may not be in a language intelligible to many musical linguists, but the basic drive is impressive.

Ruggles struggles and presses to make his point, and Thomas redoubled his exertions to make it telling. In the main, the conductor succeeded. There is so much going on at every moment and all without regard, or at least not discernibly, to harmonic lucidity. Yet it impresses an audience as does a beautiful song or drama executed in a language unknown to a listener but which by its inflections and accents conveys the intent of the composer.

Thomas' final program half was fun. No problems, just gaiety and abandon. Stravinsky's very brief Scherzo a la russe and Tchaikovsky's Divertissement from Act 3 of "Swan Lake" are cafe concert music. "Swan Lake" gives opportunities to several of the orchestra's virtuosi first-chair men, and they discharged their shares with profligate riches and reckless abandon.

76

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 3 1971

New England Newsclip

Speculum Musicae / a review

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — It is hard to imagine a quieter or more devastating comment on the emptiness and superficiality of Takemitsu's percussion showpiece, "Cassiopeia," which was on the Boston Symphony program ~~Saturday,~~ than Gunther Schuller's Music for Violin, Piano, and Percussion (1957), which was played by Speculum Musicae in the Tanglewood Chamber Music Hall Sunday evening.

Its very first gestures, a tentative trying out of single sounds by the three players, communicate a remarkable feeling for the instruments as well as a most attractive economy. They communicate, moreover, a determination to compose music, not just to make pretty noises — Schuller's sounds, by the way, are a delight — and that aim is held firmly in view through the four movements of this honest, efficient, and effective piece. Efficient is perhaps also the word that best describes the clean but less than magical performance by Rolf Schulte, violin, Ursula Oppens, piano, and Richard Fitz, percussion.

The program began with Donald Martino's tightly packed, absorbing, and rather austere Trio for Violin, Clarinet and Piano (1959), the clarinetist being Virgil Blackwell. Between the Martino and the Schuller came Charles Wuorinen's Duo for Violin and Piano (1967), whose violence of accentuation that makes even long notes seem short, and whose abruptness of procedure were arresting at first, but with which after a while I could not at this time keep contact.

If Arthur Weisberg's concert in Cambridge last week showed that you can have a beautifully wrought, flexible performance of Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire" even with a conductor, the attempt here by Speculum Musicae, Richard Fitz conducting, reverted to making the more basic point that "Pierrot" is a piece of chamber music that really resists being conducted at all. This was a particularly conducted sounding sort of performance (at least of the first seven poems, which is as much as I heard), heavy footed, and, except for Fred Sherry's remarkable cello-playing, in most respects coarse.

Speculum Musicae, which specializes in 20th century music, is a new ensemble and so far a rather uneven one, with some excellent players, and, as a distinguished performer in the audience tactfully put it, some who are getting better. Their best, like the recent performances at Dartmouth of the Carter Sonata for Flute, sichord, and of Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon," is really good, though even that, as I have remarked about the Schuller at the Tanglewood concert, tends to run more to efficiency than to magic.

Like it or not, with "Pierrot Lunaire" nowadays you are not only playing the piece, but also in a sense competing with others who play it (just as in Beethoven or Mahler), and it was disappointing that Speculum Musicae made so unconvincing a showing in it.

The name of the group, which suggests gynecologic practice, and which means "the mirror of music," is presumably borrowed from that of a 14th century theoretical treatise by one Jacob of Liege, the essay being a violent attack on the contemporary music of that day. What, by the way, is the information or ideology being conveyed when an ensemble plays Martino, Wuorinen, and Schuller in formal concert dress, but switches to casual black turtlenecks for Schoenberg (for "formal" read "semi-formal" since what started at the top with white dinner jackets and black bow ties, landed, as one read down, in baggy grey slacks and scuffed brown shoes)?

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 1 1971

New England Newsclip

6TH WEEKEND

EARL WILD

AT TANGLEWOOD

Maestro Davis Leads Symphony

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, August 6 at 9 p. m. in the Shed with guest conductor Colin Davis and soloist Zara Nelsova. The program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh symphony.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p. m. in the Shed, presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach, and Berg.

The Weekend Preludes, at 7 p. m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

At this Saturday morning Symphony open rehearsal, Davis will rehearse the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsals are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's pension fund. They are on sale at the Festival ticket office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, Aug. 7, at 8.30 p. m. in the Shed, Symphony music director William Steinberg will conduct an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's concert Music for Strings and Brass, Tanglewood artistic director Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Davis will conduct the Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, August 8 at 2.30 p. m. in the Shed. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valenté, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director.

The program opens with the "Kyrie in D minor" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, followed by the "Piano Concerto in C" with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the "Requiem" with soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Arthur Fiedler comes to Tanglewood on Tuesday evening, Aug. 3 at 8.30 p. m. in the Shed when he conducts the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood Pension Fund concert.

The all-Tchaikovsky program, with piano soloist Earl Wild, opens with the poloniase from "Eugen Onegin" followed by the Piano Concerto No. 1 with soloist Earl Wild.

Following intermission, Fiedler will conduct the suite from "Swan Lake," and the "1812 Overture."

Following the concert, there will be fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162

JUL 29 1971

New England Newsclip

2

Berkshire Festival Sets Sixth Week

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, August 6 at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed with guest conductor Colin Davis and cello soloist Zara Nelsova. Mr. Davis' program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh sympahony.

The Weekend Prelude at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach, and Berg. These Weekend Preludes, at 7:00 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The Saturday morning Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal will have Colin Davis rehearsing the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, August 7, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Gunther Schuller's Five bagatelles for orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony no. 7.

Mr. Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, August 8 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The program opens with

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

AUG 6 1971

Phyllis Curtin To Sing At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood is at hand, Aug. 6-7-8.

It begins on Friday evening at 7:00 o'clock with the weekend prelude, this week featuring soprano Phyllis Curtin singing music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg. At 9:00 Colin Davis will be making his first appearance this season at the helm of the mighty BSO he conducts a program including Elgar's Introduction and Allegro; Wood's Cello Concerto with Zara Nelsova, soloist; and concluding with Dvorak's 7th Symphony.

Saturday evening's concert will be conducted by William Steinberg and includes: Hindemith's Concert Music for strings and brass; Schuller's Five Bagatelles; and Bruckner's 7th Symphony.

On Sunday evening Colin Davis will be making the second of four scheduled appearances as he conducts an all-Mozart program: Kyrie K. 341; Piano Concerto K. 503 with Stephen Bishop at the keyboard; and the Requiem, with four soloists and the Tanglewood Chorus joining the orchestra.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUL 24 1971

Zara Nelsova to Perform At Tanglewood Aug. 6

Cellist Zara Nelsova will perform the American premiere of the Cello Concerto by Hugh Wood with the Boston Symphony Aug. 6 at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Colin Davis conducting. Curtain time, 9 p.m.

The work by the British composer was commissioned for Miss Nelsova by the BBC Symphony. She and Davis performed the world premiere with the BBC in London during August of 1969.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

FRIDAY, AUGUST 6, 1971—

Tanglewood announces varied programs for next two weekends

LENOX — The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins this evening, at 9 p.m. in the Shed with guest conductor Colin Davis and cello soloist Zara Nelsova. The program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh symphony.

Colin Davis began his career as a conductor in 1949 and gained his early experience with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra. Towards the end of 1959, at short notice, he took over a concert performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" which Otto Klemperer was forced to cancel due to illness. The great success of this performance led to wide recognition and engagements with leading orchestras in Britain and abroad. He made his United States debut with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in 1960. He conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the German premiere of Brittan's "War Requiem," and has toured extensively with the London Symphony throughout Europe and Asia. In 1967, he was appointed Chief Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. In 1969, he conducted concerts with the Boston Symphony and Los Angeles Philharmonic as well as productions of "Peter Grimes" and "Wozzeck" with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. In October 1971, he becomes Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg. The Weekend Preludes, at 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, present guest artists and member of the orchestra in short programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The Saturday morning Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal is Colin Davis rehearsing the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert.

Saturday evening, August 7 at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed, Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Gunther Schuller's Five bagatelles for orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony no. 7.

Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, August 8 at 2.30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist are pianist Stepher Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Robert Hale. The program opens with the Kyrie in D minor, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, followed by the Piano concerto in C, K. 503, with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the "Requiem" with soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Fri. Aug. 13 at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Fri. at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier."

Sat. morning, Aug. 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. That evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday at 2.30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique."

Seiji Ozawa

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

JUL 4 1971 New England Newsclip

ENGLISH conductor Colin Davis will direct the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 6, 7, 8, and 13 at Tanglewood. The program may be heard in rehearsal Aug. 7 at 10:30 a.m.

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 260,961

AUG 1 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO at Tanglewood with guest conductor

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed with guest conductor Colin Davis and cello soloist Zara Nelsova.

The program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh symphony.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, Gunther Schuller's Five bagatelles for orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony no. 7.

Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Robert Hale.

The program opens with the Kyrie in D minor, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, followed by the Piano Concerto in C, K 503, with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the Requiem with soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Arthur Fiedler comes to Tanglewood Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed when he conducts the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood Pension Fund concert. The Tchaikovsky program, with piano soloist Earl Wild, opens with the polonaise from Eugen Onegin followed by the Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Earl Wild. Following intermission, Fieldler conducts the suite from Swan Lake, and the 1812 Overture. Following the concert, there will be fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis To Lead BSO Mozart Program At Lenox

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the

COLIN DAVIS

Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, Aug. 6 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, with guest conductor Colin Davis and cello soloist Zara Nelsova. Program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg.

At the Saturday morning Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal Mr. Davis rehearses the Orchestra for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and benefit the Pension Fun. They are on sale at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, Aug. 7 at 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass, Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Colin Davis conducts an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8 at 2:30 p.m. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel and bass Robert Hale. Program opens with the Kyrie in D minor, with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, followed by the Piano concerto in C, K. 503, with soloist Stephen Bishop. Concert concludes with the Requiem.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis to be Guest Conductor at Tanglewood

Colin Davis will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox on Friday and Sunday of this coming weekend. The Friday evening concert at 9 p.m. will feature Zara Nelsova, cellist, in a program which includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Wood's Cello Concerto, and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony. Sunday afternoon at 2:30 Mr. Davis will lead the orchestra in an all-Mozart program.

Friday's concert will be prefaced by a musical prelude from 7 p.m. which will feature soloists Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and Ryan Edwards, pianist, in a program of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg.

Colin Davis began his career as a conductor in 1949 and gained his early experience with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra. Towards the end of 1959, at short notice he took over a concert performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni which Otto Klemperer was forced to cancel due to illness. The great success of this performance led to wide recognition and engagements with leading orchestras in Britain and abroad.

He made his United States debut with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in 1960. He conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the German premiere of Brittan's War Requiem, and has toured extensively with the London Symphony throughout Europe and Asia.

In 1967, he was appointed Chief Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. In 1969, he conducted concerts with the Boston Symphony and Los Angeles Philharmonic as well as productions of Peter Grimes and Wozzeck with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. In October 1971, he becomes Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

The Saturday morning Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal will be Colin Davis rehearsing the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are available and proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, August 7, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg will conduct an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert Music for strings and brass, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony no. 7.

Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The program opens with the Kyrie in D minor with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, followed by the Piano Concerto in C with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the Requiem with soloists soprano, Benita Valente, alto, Beverly Wolff, tenor, Kenneth Riegel, bass, Robert Hale, and the Chorus.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 8 1971

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD—Lenox, Mass. Colin David conducts an all Mozart program today at 2:30 p.m. Guest artist Stephen Bishop. Also Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Keneth Riegal, Robert Hale and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Colin Davis Directs Tanglewood Concert

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday, August 6 at 9 p.m. in the Shed with guest conductor Colin Davis and cello soloist Zara Nelsova.

The program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Wood's Cello concerto and Dvorak's Seventh symphony.

Colin Davis began his career as a conductor in 1949 and gained his early experience with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra. Towards the end of 1959, at short notice, he took over a concert performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" which Otto Klemperer was forced to cancel due to illness. The great success of this performance led to wide recognition and engagements with leading orchestras in Britain and abroad. In October 1971, he becomes music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg.

The Weekend Preludes, at 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The Saturday morning Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal is Colin Davis rehearsing the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals benefit the orchestra's pension fund. They are on sale at the festival ticket office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday, August 7 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert music for strings and brass, Tanglewood artistic director, Gunther Schuller's Five bagatelles for orchestra nd Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday, August 8 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Robert Hale.

The program opens with the "Kyrie in D minor," with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, followed by the Piano concerto in C, K. 503, with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the "Requiem" with soloists soprano Benita Valente, also Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Arthur Fielder comes to Tanglewood on Tuesday evening, August 3 at 7:30 p.m. in the Shed, when he conducts the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood Pension Fund Concert.

The all-Tchaikovsky program, with piano soloist Earl Wild, opens with the polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" followed by the Piano concerto no. 1 with soloist Earl Wild. Following intermission, Mr. Fielder conducts the suite from "Swan Lake," and the "1812 Overture." Following the concert, there will be fireworks over the Stockbridge Bowl.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 31 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
W. 104,870

AUG 1 1971 New England Newsclip

Coming To Tanglewood

KENNETH RIEGEL appears in the Mozart Requiem under the baton of Colin Davis at Tanglewood on Sunday, August 8. Mr. Riegel will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as part of an ALL-MOZART program on Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 31 1971 New England Newsclip

For The Record

Theater

At The Theater

Colonie Coliseum Theatre, Latham. "Hello, Dolly!" with Jane Morgan, through Sunday. Starting Tuesday, "Burlesque Follies."

Berkshire Theater Festival Stockbridge, Mass. "Are You or Have You Ever Been Blue?" a new play by Leslie Weiner, starring Rita Moreno, through Saturday. Preview Tuesday of "Where Has Tommy Flowers Gone?" by Terence McNally. The management advises that the show contains controversial language.

Woodstock Theater, Woodstock, N.Y. "Fiddler on the Roof," through Sunday, Aug. 10-15.

Williamstown Theater, Williamstown, Mass. Brecht's "Mother Courage," through Saturday.

Towers Hall Playhouse, Lake George Village. "Stop the World, I Want to Get Off," Tuesday-Saturday.

Lenox Arts Center, Lenox, Mass. Jack MacGowarn and Martin Best in Best's "From Our Dissension," an evening of Shakespeare and Song, Thursday-Sunday.

Christian Community Players, East Greenbush, present Ionesco's "The Bald Soprano," at Holy Spirit Church Thursday at 8 p.m.

Shaker Summer Theater, Shaker Junior High School. "The Children's Hour," by Lillian Hellman, Thursday and Friday at 8:15 p.m.

Film Series

RPI Chapel and Cultural Center, Burdett Avenue. Tuesday at 7:30 and 10 p.m., "Potemkin."

Albany Public Library, 19 Dove St., Albany. Thursday at 8 p.m., the Woodstock Generation vs. The Establishment. "The Religious Element in Today's Life Style," concluding meeting features Rev. Clark Callender. Monday Family Film Series, "Blue Dashiki" and "Niok."

Schenectady County Public Library, Liberty and Clinton Streets, Schenectady. Today at 8 p.m., "Kind Hearts and Coronets."

SPAC Film Festival, Spa Summer Theater, Saratoga. Today through Saturday at 7:30 and 9:30 p.m., "A Day at the Races." Monday-Tuesday at 7:30 and 9:30, "Mississippi Mermaid," Truffault.

Art

Music-Dance

And all that Jazz is the Jazz Cellar Six Plus One, playing at the ninth annual jazz party put on by Vanguard for the Albany Symphony. Thursday at 6:30 to 12 p.m. at Baker's Barn, 403 Loudonville Rd., Loudonville.

Jacob's Pillow, Lee, Mass. The Boston Ballet Company under the direction of Virginia Williams, through Sunday.

Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday at 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude with Phyllis Curtin. 9 p.m., Colin Davis directs the Boston Symphony in a program of Elgar, Wood with Zara Nelsova, and Dvorak. Saturday at 10:30 a.m., Open Rehearsal; at 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg conducts Hindemith, Schuller, Bruckner. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts a Mozart program, with Stephen Bishop, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Kenneth Riegel, Robert Hale and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

SPAC Amphitheater, Saratoga. Today at 8:30, the Philadelphia Orchestra opens the season with William Steinberg conducting a program of Strauss: "Don, Juan, "Death and Transfiuration," "Till Eulenspiege"; and Wagner: "Prelude to Tristan and Isolde, Sigried Idyll" and "Prelude to Die Meistersinger." Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Daniel Barenboim conducting, with Pinchas Zukerman guest violinist. Liszt: "Les Preludes;" Tchaikovsky: "Violin Concerto: Brahms: "Symphony No. 4." Friday at 8:30 p.m., Daniel Barenboim conducting, and at the piano. Beethoven: "Piano Concerto No. 1; Tchaikovsky: "Symphony No. 6." Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducting, Nedda Casei, guest contralto. Falla: Suite from El Amor Brujo;" Two Suites from "The Three-Cornered Hat;" Ravel: Suite No. 2 from Daphnis and Chloe Bolero." Sunday at 8:30 p.m. Jack Benny and Henry Mancini with The Concert Orchestra of Forty. Monday at 8:30 p.m., The Carpenters and Mac Davis. Tuesday at 2:30 p.m., Student Matinee, William Smith conducting; Mason Jones, French horn soloist.

SPAC, Canfield Casino, Saratoga. Monday at 8:30 p.m., The DePasquale String Quartet, Schumann and Dvorak.

SPAC, Spa Summer Theater, Saturday at 2:30 p.m., Modern Dance Showcase: The Paul Taylor Dance Company in "Book of Beasts," "Insects and Heroes," "Big Bertha." Same program Sunday at 8:30 p.m.

Saint Peter's Music Festival, 102 State St., Albany. From 12:15 to 12:45 p.m. in the garden, Nick Brignola and the Non-Profit Organization.

Music

Greenroom

Margaret Beals will be conducting two extraordinary courses this month at the School of Modern Dance at SPAC. An introductory class in basic yoga techniques, emphasizing relaxation and flexibility of the body, concentration of the mind, and full use of the breath, structured for any interested party who regards maximum physical and mental discipline as a means to fulfillment of personal goals. The second course "seeks to explore and develop the art of improvisation as a performance medium" . . . for performing artists. Each course is for three weeks.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,215

AUG 4 1971

Tanglewood

Colin Davis Wields Baton For This Week's Concerts

Colin Davis

Daniel Barenboim will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon Aug. 1 at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood in Schubert's Rosamunde Overture, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. Violinist Pinchas Zukerman will be soloist in the Lalo piece.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra Saturday evening, July 31, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists are Byron Janis, piano, and Stomu Yamash'ta, percussion. The program is Haydn's Symphony No. 96, Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto, with Byron Janis, and Takemitsu's "Cassiopeia" with Yamash'ta.

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, Aug. 6, at 9 p.m. with guest conductor Colin Davis and soloist Zara Nelsova. Davis' program includes Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Wood's Cello Concerto and Dvorak's Seventh Symphony.

Colin Davis began his career as a conductor in 1949 and gained his early experience with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra. Toward the end of 1959, at short notice he took over a concert performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" which Otto Klemperer was forced to cancel due to illness. The success of this performance led to wide recognition and engagements with leading orchestras in Britain and abroad. In 1967, he was appointed Chief Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. In October 1971, he becomes Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden.

The weekend prelude Friday, Aug. 6 at 7 p.m., presents a recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin with Ryan Edwards at the piano. Miss Curtin sings music of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Berg.

The Saturday morning open rehearsal is Colin Davis conducting the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets are on sale at the ticket office the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, Aug. 7, at 8:30 p.m. Boston Symphony Music Director William Steinberg conducts an all-orchestral program including Hindemith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass, Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8 at 2:30 p.m. Soloists are pianist Stephen Bishop, soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The program opens with the Kyrie in D Minor with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, followed by the Piano Concerto in C with soloist Stephen Bishop. The concert concludes with the Requiem with soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass Robert Hale, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 38,127

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 7 1971 New England Newsclip

New Conductor Slated for BSO Concert

LENOX — Tonight's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood will be conducted by the Italian Maderna instead of William Steinberg, as previously announced.

The program includes Gunther Schuller's "Five Bagatelles," Mozart's "Prague' Symphony, and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

Bruno Maderna made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during Tanglewood's second weekend this season.

William Steinberg, who is the Boston Orchestra's music director, asked to be relieved of conducting this concert and a forthcoming one with the Cleveland Orchestra in preparation for extensive preseason work in Pittsburgh where hs is also music director.

He is supervising final acoustic tests of the newly refurbished Heinz Hall in Pittsburgh.

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 29,772

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 54,587

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 7 1971 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
D. 13,000

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

CONDUCTS AT TANGLEWOOD

LENOX, Mass. (UPI)— Italian conductor Bruno Maderna will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood Saturday, replacing William Steinberg, it was announced Thursday.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 2 1971 New England Newsclip

By Christion Steiner

Benita Valente

. . . will be the soprano soloist in the Boston Symphony's performance of Mozart's Requiem, under the direction of Colin Davis, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 9 1971

Colin Davis Masterful As Chorus Director

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

On the strength o fSunday afternoon's performance of Mozart's Requiem, it would appear Colin Davis, the English conductor, has emerged as one of the very few major young music directors who really knows how deal with both the chorus and solo singers.

His directio nof the Requiem was a model of synergy, the soloist, the orchestra, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, all giving great and valuable contributions to the whole.

Whatever, ineffable and inexplicable quality a conductor must have to make an amateur chorus (most of them are amateurs) perform at the top of and beyond thei rinnate abiity, Davis has it in full mesure. The choral dynamics, diction, and drive ws by far the best I have ever heard from them.

THE REASON s quite simple, really. Davis thinks that they are important, in fact, he realizes as so few others do, that the chorus is,indeed, the soloist, so we hear them, all of them, even the basses, those poor, forgotten souls of most big choral groups.

The quartet of soloists that were gathered for this performance were absolutely first-rate in every respect. Benite Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, mezzo; Kenneth Regel, tenor and Robert Hale, baass baritone, were persuaded to keep their considerable voices and talent completely under the benign, but firm control of Maestro Davis. The results were outstanding. It is very rare that four fine solo voices can be induced to perform properly and subtly as part of a greater whole, as was the dase this afternoon.

THE CREDIT IS for all, but Davis without question has a real talent for directing singers and, believe me, many of the famous conductors of the great lyric theaters are seldom completely successful when it comes to the mystique of the vocal arts.

But this wasn't all, not by a longshot. Davis, in his approach to the Mozart Piano Concerto in C. employed a more standard and traditonal technqie and coincident with a fine performance by Stephen Bishop, pianist. They did a job that was notable for the grace and enthusiasm which permeated the work.

It must be again remarked that this performance of the Requiem must rank with the great ones that I have heard, both on records and live, and, again, cfedit to all but the major share must be given Colin Davis.

In terms of the almost noribund choral art, he issurely the man to lead us out of the wilderness and if one considers the vastness and the value of the coral repertory, what a sublime voyage that could be.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 7 1971 New England Newsclip

4426 Appreciate Davis, Nelsova At Tanglewood

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The names of Colin Davis and Zara Nelsova are not such as might draw great crowds to Tanglewood, but they draw serious attention among music lovers.

Daivs is chief conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London. Miss Nelsova is a first-rank solo cellist. Davis was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Friday night, and Miss Nelsova was there to play Hugh Wood's cello concerto (Opus 12) with the orchestra.

There were only 4426 listeners there to hear them. They responded to the Wood concerto something like an audience in Germany, not with sudden, loud enthusiasm, but with sedate applause that lasted far beyond routine politeness.

It was obvious that the listeners appreciated it, although it is not likeable music. Indeed, as an example of new (1969) music founded in the 12-tone method of composition, it is not intended to be likeable.

It is a strong, intensely serious musical statement, however, and is full of almost-traditional sounds, even though new.

Miss Nelsova dug into its intensity with appropriate fervor. Her aggressive, almost masculine, style with the cello is well cast for this piece, and it is likely that the long applause was intended more for her consummate skill in the face of its difficulty than for the music itself.

Nevertheless, the piece appeared Friday to have more than enough substance to have an important stage life. Its performance was the first in the United States.

The opening Introduction and Allegro for Strings and Orchestra by Elgar and the closing Symphony No. 7 by Dvorak, were conducted by Davis with honesty and understanding.

He is not a conductor for those who like spectacular fireworks and supersonic thrills. He is a serious and highly skilled musician who has the reputation of unfailingly producing a performance satisfying to those who really care about the music.

That's what he did Friday.

Moremremoremore

Phyllis Curtin, who is serving Tanglewood this summer as artist-in-residence, served up a recital program of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss, Bach and Alban Berg for the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Her stature as a soprano of international importance and professional reliability was demonstrated July 25 when she made a substitute appearance on short notice as one of the soloists for Beethoven's Missa Solemnis under the direction of Leonard Bernstein.

She has sung at Tanglewood (and in and around Springfield) many times and has been unfailingly satisfying as a first-class professionl.

Lately, it seems to me, she has been mellowing in vocal tone as well as manner. Friday during the opening songs of her program she seemed to be singing with a warmth and human flexibility that are welcome additions to her style.

A song by J.S. Bach, "Bist Du Bei Mir," was especially beautiful. It soared with freedom and benevolence.

The last part of her regular program was made up of seven songs by Alban Berg, a student of Arnold Schoenberg.

They were songs of intense emotion, of depth of expression and difficulty of execution. They sound alike, even though set to poems of differing sentiments.

Anguish seems to be their primary message and Miss Curtin delivered this message with the regal brilliance she is well known for.

Tonight Bruno Maderna will take William Steinberg's place on the podium to conduct a program of Hindemith, Schuller and Bruckner.

Sunday Davis will return for an all-Mozart program including a piano concerto (K.503) and the Requiem (K.626) with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Draws 21,745 for Weekend

Tanglewood drew a total audience of 21,745 over the weekend, down slightly from the 22,646 that attended for the same period last year.

Friday night's concert was heard by 2,905, the Saturday morning rehearsal drew 4,426, the Saturday night concert 5,753, and yesterday afternoon 8,661.

Art
EAGLE 8/9/71

Music Review

All-Mozart at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH Tanglewood weekend introduced a new conductor, Colin Davis, to the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon audiences and presented another, Bruno Maderna, making his second appearance on this podium.

The programs were above ordinary. Davis concentrated on Mozart yesterday afternoon and allotted half of Friday's concert to the music of his countrymen, Sir Edward Elgar and Hugh Wood. Maderna presented the first performance of these festivals of Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra and the huge Bruckner Symphony No. 7 in E.

Davis immediately impressed his listeners with his straightforward attitude toward the music at hand. The Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings enlists a quartet of soloists, but its lush texture and gorgeous sonority are of a kind into which musicians like to sink their teeth. The Bostonian strings went after it with relish and made it glow. It has a character which Vaughan Williams later may well have emulated in his "Tallis" theme. The soloists were the first chair men of the orchestra's string sections, but all were not equally effective in the pseudo Welsh tune which becomes the main theme. In spite of the diatonic restrictions with which contemporary composers believe themselves hampered, it is remarkable what eloquence can still be achieved in traditional discourse.

Davis ended his evening with the 7th Symphony of Dvorak, Opus 70, in D Minor. Dvorak was no experimenter. He was a lovable man, and he expressed musically the simple beauty which pervaded his nature and which most often emanated from the soil of his native land. There are no problems, psychologically or even harmonically. No anguish even in his nostalgic images.

This mood was far removed from that of the cello concerto of Hugh Wood, which Zara Nelsova played so heroically in mid-concert. Wood, born in 1932, is a confessed adherent of the Schoenberg principle, but he uses it to express unrelieved stress and never for mere academic indebtedness. Miss Nelsova played with positive conviction. A long solo introduction is sparsely joined by the winds to which immediate relevance is not in evidence. Miss Nelsova's tone and powerful bow were consummately adequate to cope with the massive cooperation Wood enforces on the orchestra as the single movement concerto progresses. Davis controlled the irregular metric pattern with ease and certainty.

* * *

SATURDAY night, Bruno Maderna, who had conducted one of the earlier concerts this season, took over on short notice from William Steinberg. He adhered to the original program except for the substitution of a Mozart symphony, the "Prague" No. 38 in D (K504), to replace Hindemith's "Concert Music."

The main part of the evening was devoted to the Bruckner 7th Symphony in E, and Maderna set a track record. Steinberg took well over an hour to do it in Paris in May. Maderna did it here in 55 minutes. It must be the water.

Whitestone

Colin Davis

Yet he scored deeply in the magnificent sounds Bruckner makes possible in so many episodes of this symphony. But early in the first movement, where Bruckner indicated that he would like it to be reposeful (ruhig), Maderna gamboled like a faun at eve. The conductor can be excused if he didn't effect some of the sudden changes of dynamics. There were enough opulent rewards to make the performance seem timeless. To name but one, the dirge-like theme of the Adagio, Bruckner's greatest page, was played by the violas and tenor tubas with lasting impact and when all the strings, but especially the firsts, attack the rising three-note figure on a rising major third on the higher registers of the G string, one heard the glory of the Boston orchestra at its finest.

Gunther Schuller is unduly diffident in entitling his five short sketches for orchestra "Bagatelles." Especially in Maderna's hands they have more significance than trifles. Essentially, however, they are exercises in orchestral research, testing antipodal registers under various chapters. Some are quiet and without rhythmic momentum, others are brash, relying heavily on the brass and percussion. Schuller writes less well, it would appear, for the strings than for the winds. At least he favors them less, although he gave them their best opportunity in the third Bagatelle. But mainly there are dabs of tone, splashes of exclamations and little superficial cohesion.

* * *

YESTERDAY afternoon Davis was the conductor in a Mozart program of which the major work was the great Requiem. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor, responded to Davis's inspired direction with superbly alert tonal variety. The four distinguished soloists, Benita Valente, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass, complemented the performance both singly and in their ensembles.

Davis uses plenty of muscular tension in his conducting manner, but he is totally concerned in conveying his valid wishes to the performers. He succeeds admirably. It is remarkable how dramatically effective the Requiem is in a concert hall, just as it is solemnly appropriate in a setting where the Boston Symphony performed in January of 1964, in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston to honor the memory of President Kennedy.

Memorable was the Kyrie Eleison leading from the Introitus and soon succeeding in the Tuba Mirum. Equally telling in another sound effect was the restrained Domine Jesu and the Hostias.

Mozart uses an unusual orchestra for his Requiem, employing only basset horns and bassoons from the reeds. The basset horns, tenor clarinets in F, were played by Pasquale Cardillo and Felix Viscuglia. He also uses trumpets and trombones, and the usual strings and organ. In several instances, the tympani are given special emphasis, but there are few purely orchestral statements in the whole work.

After the opening Kyrie in D Minor (K.341), Stephen Bishop was the soloist in the C major piano concerto (K.503). He enunciated a performance of rare distinction, highlighted by tonal splendor. Davis gave him fastidious support.

* * *

THE WEEKEND Prelude offered the purchasers of the Friday night orchestra seats the bonus of a short recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin. In addition to her many attributes as an artist, Miss Curtin is not surpassed as a constructor of programs. She divided her concert, all sung in German, into two sections. The first consisted of five songs of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss and Bach, all of which contained the avowal "thou art" (du bist) in the opening line of its poem.

Miss Curtin makes a regal appearance and is at the peak of her artistic maturity. In voice production, control of nuance and validity of taste, she made each of her dozen songs a gem. The second half of the program had an additional fillip by the rendition of the "Seven Early Songs" of Alban Berg, each to a verse by a different poet.

The collaboration of Ryan Edwards at the piano foritifed the impression Miss Curtin made in every song, not least in the "Night" in which the Debussyesque misty floating of Berg's mood with Hauptmann's poem were infallibly conveyed by both voice and piano. Equally faithfully realized was the same suite's "Traumgekront" (Crowned with dreams), in which Berg melded his vein with Rilke's text and which were thoroughly penetrated by Miss Curtin and her accompanist.

The artists graciously bowed to the insistent demands of their audience and added songs of Perceval, Ginastera, Joaquin Nin, Virgil Thompson, Poulenc and Villa-Lobos. The audience would not be surfeited and only the fact that the hall had been rented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 8 on determined the conclusion of Miss Curtin's efforts.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Davis Conducts Mozart

By DOROTHY STOWE

Colin Davis, the noted British conductor who has several times appeared as a guest on the Boston Symphony's podium, made his Tanglewood debut this past weekend. For his second appearance on Sunday afternoon Davis conducted an all-Mozart program, and proved himself to be the masterful interpreter of that composer which his reputation promised.

The major offering of the afternoon was the beautiful Requiem (K. 626). This work had been commissioned in the summer of 1791 by Count Walsegg. When Mozart died in December of that year at the age of thirty-five he had been unable to complete it, although it had been his obsessive desire to do so. There are no existing drafts for several of the movements, but most authorities theorize that he must have sung much of the mass during his last illness to his wife and his pupil Sussmayr, who was subsequently able to complete and orchestrate it for performance.

Under Davis' baton the work proved to be a successful fusion of all elements. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus (coached by John Oliver and the Boston Symphony, reduced to suitable Mozartean proportions, performed tellingly together. Especially moving was the beautiful soprano of Benita Valente, a voice ideally suited to the serene and soaring passages asigned to her. Soloist Beverly Wolff, Kenneth Riegel and Robert Hale also contributed effectively.

Davis' approach to the work is essentially English — a cool, cohesive performance with ideal tempi, which while often seemingly sparse somehow leaves one amply filled. Typical of this was the impression made by the beautiful Recordare solo quartet, poised and understated in its dynamics, which yet seemed deeply changed with the intercessions of the spirit.

Beginning with the tranquil requiem prayer and the clearly articulated fugal Kyrie, the performance rose to considerable heights of passion in the Dies Irae, characterized by a demonic vitality seldom associated with Mozart. The poignant Lacrimosa was of most moving effect, but to my Americanized mind the Domine Jesu and Hostias could have used a little more sense of desparation and urgency. Yet nothing could have improved the serenity of the Benedictus or the fulfillment of the fugal Kyrie, repeated at the end. One must agree that "out of tremor and guilt (this work) leads us gently toward peace and salvation."

Of special interest was the Boston Symphony debut of Stephen Bishop. This young Los Angeles borne pianist has spent considerable time in England, and yesterday performed as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C, K. 503. This concerto is little performed, and while not greatly distinctive from other Mozart concertos it afforded an excellent vehicle to display his fine sense of style and a good commanding concerto tone which carried well throughout the shed.

The opening selection of yesterday's concert was the Kyrie in D Minor, K. 341, performed by the chorus and orchestra. It is a gentle and confident work, composed by Mozart in his youth, and well presaged the spirit of the music to follow.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 9 1971

Davis Makes Tanglewood Debut

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — This weekend marked the Tanglewood debut of Colin Davis, and Sunday's concert was devoted to one of his specialties, the music of Mozart.

In addition to two choral works, the "Kyrie in D Minor, K. 341" and the "Requiem, K. 626," the program also featured the 'Piano Concerto No. 25 in C, K. 503". The soloist in the concerto was Stephen Bishop, who was making his Boston Symphony debut.

THE "REQUIEM" received a magnificent performance. Mr. Davis stressed the work's drama, and if any refutation was needed for the lingering stereotype of Mozart as pretty" music, this was it. Yet the reading was never brutal or unstylish and the power arose from the music itself. One left admiring the score rather than the effects of a "virtuoso" conductor. To resort to a cliche, Mr. Davis' is the art that conceals art.

Assisting in the choral works was the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The excellent soloists in the 'Requiem" were Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Kenneth Riegel, and Robert Hale.

Mr. Bishop was less than completely successful in the concerto although his playing was fluent, clean, and accurate. His tone is rather hard and this may have been partially, but not completely, responsible for the cold, inexpressive quality of his performance. He too often seemed to be merely picking away at the music.

IN CONTRAST, Mr. Davis supplied an ideal accompaniment.

He perfectly captured the galante buoyancy and grace of the music. The Boston Symphony responded with refined, stylish playing. The solo winds in particular projected their parts with an expressivity so lacking in the pianist.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Two Guest Conductors Score at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Conductors Colin Davis and Bruno Maderna had little to offer the Berkshire Music Festival's sixth weekend audiences if the patrons were looking for melodramatics, extravagant gestures and hoop-la.

What the conductors did provide the Boston Symphony and combined audiences of 21,745 was high-level podium craftsmanship.

Italian composer-conductor Maderna substituted Saturday night for William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony's regular conductor. Steinberg asked to be relieved of this concert and one in Cleveland so that he could supervise final acoustical tests of newly-refurbished Heinz Hall in Pittsburgh, where he is also music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Chief conductor for BBC in London, Davis made his Tanglewood debut at Friday night's concert. He directed an all-Mozart program yesterday afternoon.

Soloists Appear

Stephen Bishop was piano soloist yesterday in Concerto in C, K.626. Soloists in the Requiem, K.626 were Benita Valente, soprano; Beverly Wolff, contralto; Kenneth Riegel, tenor; Robert Hale, bass. The latter two made their debuts yesterday with the Boston Symphony. All sang well without conspicuous distinction.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus of 100 mixed voices achieved a good body of tone in both the Requiem and the D minor Kyrie, K.341. Nuances were rich, attacks were precise and firm.

A fugue in the Requiem's Kyrie was solidly assembled and Davis kept the orchestral part parallel.

Davis was clear in purpose, economical in movement without being sparing. Cues were a fraction before results. More important, Davis provided all the podium technique necessary for a high-level musical performance, but over and above was a spiritual message significant in text and character.

Pianist Capable

The orchestra gave Bishop an introduction of symphonic proportions. The young pianist had a bit of the virtuoso in mannerisms with no undermining influences on clear passagework, singing tone (notably in the slow movement), tastefully-restrained dynamics, polished phrasing and subtleties of Mozartean style.

Bishop is not outstanding in this jet-propelled age of keyboard pilots. But there was an appealing honesty and a refreshing integrity in his treatment of the Mozart Concerto.

For those who had not heard Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles before, they were the pleasant surprise of Saturday night's concert.

Brief, abstract and mood conjuring, the Bagatelles are vivid creations in sound. The language was eerie, tart, soothing and startling. Unlike some contemporary works played this summer at Tanglewood, Schuller's were divorced from gimmicry.

They are not only skillful studies in orchestral technique but compellingly adaptable to self-interpretation. Schuller's reaction to Maderna when he took several curtain calls was nothing short of ecstatic.

Maderna sculptured Bruckner's Seventh Symphony as a grandiloquent work of Wagnerian breadth and epic dimensions.

After its eloquent start in cellos, the symphony thrived on its structural strength, bucolic charm, blasting brasses — all imbued with vitality and sensitivity.

Maderna's penchant for lively tempos gave the work uncommon push, especially the opening movement and scherzo.

Prague Symphony

Mozart's "Prague" Symphony didn't really reach its stride until the finale. It was a substitution for Hindemith's Concert Music for string orchestra and brass that Steinberg was to conduct.

Rhythmic imperfections and defective intonation in the "Prague" didn't matter so much as mechanical, sometimes rather lifeless stretches in the first two movements.

The finale was accelerated, flashy and exuberant, triggering big applause.

But it was after the Bruckner Seventh that Maderna received one of the biggest ovations of the summer.

Music Review

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Bruno Maderna, conductor
Symphony No. 38 in D, K.504 "Prague" — Mozart
Five Bagatelles for Orchestra — Schuller
Symphony No. 7 in E — Bruckner

Sunday Afternoon
Colin Davis, conductor
All-Mozart

Kyrie in D minor, K.341
Tanglewood Festival Chorus

Piano Concerto in C, K.503
Stephen Bishop, pianist

Requiem in D minor, K.626
Benita Valente, soprano
Beverly Wolff, contralto
Kenneth Riegel, tenor
Robert Hale, bass
Tanglewood Festival Chorus

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Hugh Wood concerto debuts under Colin Davis at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Colin Davis was guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tanglewood concerts Friday evening and Sunday afternoon. On Sunday, there was the known and admired excellence of his Mozart: in the C major — piano concerto, K. 503, he provided a superb framework for what turned out to be the musical vacuity and technical slovenliness of Stephen Bishop's playing, and he conducted magnificent performances of the somber and grand C Kyrie in D minor, K. 341, and of the Requiem. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, prepared by John Oliver, sang well, and Benita Valente, Beverly Wolffe, Kenneth Riegel, and Robert Hale were a solo quartet of unusual excellence.

Friday, along with Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings and the Dvorak D minor symphony, number 7, Davis conducted the American premiere, with Zara Nelsovaas soloist, of a cello concerto written in 1969 by the 39-year old English composer, Hugh Wood.

Two thoughts that had occurred to me at the dress rehearsal, when I was somehow trying to "place" the new concerto, both showed up to greet me in the program notes at Friday's concert. One is in a comment by the composer: "I'm quite aware that the piece is a stranger on the scene of 1970, remote from the preoccupation of my contemporaries in form, content, idiom, style." Then, having played with the idea that maybe this was the cello concerto Alban Berg never wrote, I found, quoted from an article by Ates Orga: "In emotional and lyric display the concerto's most immediate predecessor would appear to be Berg's for violin."

By Wood, I had otherwise heard only a record of the string quartet from the early sixties, full of Schoenberg, intelligent, controlled and rather constrained in expression. The concerto is a far more open piece whose Bergian lyricism has been invaded by some of the rhapsodic "Shelomo" rhetoric that runs through so much 20th-century cello writing. There is just one movement, 15 to 20 minutes of flexible tempo in a range from moderate to slow, beginning quietly and moving also to a quiet ending (with a touching reference to Elgar's concerto), but knotting itself up with a series of dramatically-placed climaxes along the way.

The concerto is richly scored for a large orchestra, but Wood has solved the notorious problem of cello audibility by unleashing full orchestral power only between the solo declamations, otherwise, even during the cello's most impassioned high-register wailings, keeping the accompaniment down, though always vivid. If Wood says anything new, I do not hear it, but he makes his traditional eschatological statement eloquently and arrestingly. It is clean and honest music, and with all its professionalism, there is something stubbornly non-facile about it that appeals greatly. It is also an effective virtuoso piece — this, too, in terms of traditional technique — and Zara Nelsova's playing, strongly scaffolded by Davis and the orchestra, was almost unbelieveably good, instrumentally as well as in intensity of expression.

The weekend's surprise was William Steinberg's cancellation of his Saturday night concert, a decision made as a safeguard to his health by cutting down his work load before the opening of his Pittsburgh season on Sept. 10, but attributed with less than ideal accuracy and candor to "scheduling difficulties" by the management in a program insert. Steinberg's place was taken by Bruno Maderna, who kept Schuller's "Bagatelle" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, but substituted Mozart's Prague symphony for Hindermith's Concert Music for Strings and Brass.

Maderna departed from the traditional prophet-and-peasant Bruckner to give us a mercurial, capricious figure whose ideas keep tumbling out as though under great pressure, with a kind of maniacal, far from solemn, religious fervor as just one of its many moods. It was a fast performance, but more striking than that, it was unusually flexible in tempo. These tempo changes were always organic, and it is not Maderna's perceptive analysis through pacing that is in question as much as the desirability of so explicitly explanatory an interpretation in the first place. I was glad to get Maderna's view of Bruckner, but I was more fascinated than convinced. Maderna by the way is one of the few who at the climax of the adagio omits the cymbal clash whose authenticity is so controversial.

Though cleaner and more sharp-edged in detail. Maderna's performance of the Schuller "Bagatelle" was less interesting as projection of musical character than Steinberg's. In the Mozart there was some finely - thought - through splendidly articulated playing, notably in the development of the first movement, but also lots of absent-minded coasting.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Maderna Scores Triumph With Bruckner Symphony

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — With nothing but charity in his heart Saturday night, Bruno Maderna stole a big chunk out of Colin Davis' weekend at Tanglewood.

Glow Shared

Davis, who is chief conductor of the BBC Orchestra in London, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night and Sunday afternoon.

As one of the bright young men of the music world, he was expected to dominate the weekend, especially with the Mozart Requie m Sunday afternoon.

But in spite of a magnificent performance of the Requiem, he had to relinquish some of the glow of his victory to the triumph scored by Maderna, an Italian composer-conductor who has been at Tanglewood all summer.

Sudden Replacement

William Steinberg, Boston's music director, had been scheduled to conduct Saturday night, but he indicated early in the week that he might have to go to Pittsburgh and a replacement would be needed.

Maderna had three days to study the music, and when it was definitely decided that he would conduct, there was time for only one less-than-normal-length rehearsal.

The orchestra, of course, was well acquainted with Mozart's "Prague Symphony," which was on the program, and had played Schuller's "Five Bagatelles" and Bruckner's Seventh Sumphony as recently as April during its European tour.

Speed Without Loss

But the Bruckner symphony is a formidable work. One member of the orchestra has timed it twice under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, once at 63½ minutes and on another occasion at 67 minutes. Steinberg also tends to set a leisurely pace for it.

Maderna did it Saturday in 56 minutes, and at no time did the orchestra sound rushed. On the contrary, while it was bright and alive and unflagging in its command of the attention (which is not common with Bruckner), its essentially serious substance seemed undamaged.

Maderna carefully controlled outlines of phrasing. He let it dwell lovingly on moments of melody and sensuous sonority and then moved briskly and jauntily through connecting passages of less musical interest.

It was an intelligent and sensitive shaping under duress of a difficult work and he was given an ovation.

Metronomic Rhythm

He had somewhat less success with the Mozart symphony. It was neat enough (the Boston Orchestra could hardly be less) and the continuity was sustained gracefully but there were stretches when the rhythym became too regular, almost metronomic.

Schuller's "Five Bagatelles" were okay if you like contemporary atonal style. Each was designed by the composer in his words "to isolate one of the new problems orchestral players face in the performance of new music."

With that academic purpose in mind, I can say that I liked best the second, which illustrates sudden surprises in volume changes and the fourth, which illustrates complexities of mixed rhythms.

The Sunday afternoon program with Colin Davis on the podium had its disappointments but the overriding memory is of the power and beauty of Mozart's Requiem.

Valente Impressive

Of the soloists, the most impressive were Benita Valente, a soprano with a superb voice, and Beverly Wolff, a contralto with a full round warm resonance . . .equally superb.

The Requiem is a wonderful work which keeps the chorus busy for nearly an hour and there are many good things to say about it, the melodies in the Lacrymosa for instance and especially the Hostias.

The score given to the soprano, also, is much coveted because of the flattering sounds it invites that lady to produce.

Davis handled his forces with finesse and taste, although he might have modified with profit some of the passages of high volume of which there are more than enough, and it would have been helpful if he had persuaded the chorus to enunciate its Latin more clearly and execute its entrances and exits a bit more crisply.

Routine Competence

The major disappointment of the afternoon was the Mozart Piano Concerto (K. 503) for which Stephen Bishop, a young American who has spent most of his professional life in London, played the solo part.

Bishop played with routine competence, much as a listener might expect any of a couple of hundred available solo pianists to play. His approach was firm, reliable and accurate but with none of the sensitivity of expression essential to the satisfying performance of Mozart's music.

Attendance totals f or the weekend are 4426 Friday night, 2905 at the Saturday morning open rehearsal, 5733 Saturday night and 8661 Sunday afternoon for a total of 21,745. There were 9626 at the Tuesday Boston Pops with Arthur Fiedler.

Next Weekend

Next Friday Christoph Eschenbach will play Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" sonata for solo piano at the 7 p.m. prelude program and Colin Davis will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tangelwood Festival Chorus at 9 in Schubert's Mass in G and Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

Saturday night at 8.30 Davis will conduct the orchestra with Judith Raskin, soprano soloist, in a program of Mozart's Symphony No. 39 (K. 543) and Mahler's Symphony No. 4.

Sunday afternoon Seija Ozawa will conduct the orchestra, the Berkshire Boy Choir and Christoph Eschenbach, pianist, in a program which will include Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 97,539

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

All-Mozart at Tanglewood Draws 8,661 Music Lovers

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — A happy combination of factors drew 8.661 to Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, by far the best attendance of the weekend. An all-Mozart program held definite charm. The "Requiem," with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus of 100 voices, elicited even more "bravos" than the delightful work of 31-year-old pianist Stephen Bishop, in the "Concerto in C," K. 503.

All of these gems, and the opening choral "Kyrie in D minor," K. 341, glowed warmly under the inspiring direction of Colin Davis, the British conductor who has led the Boston Symphony several times at Symphony Hall, but never at Tanglewood. Significant is the fact that he is the only conductor to lead four concerts at Tanglewood this summer, except for the regular B.S.O. staff. He made his initial Tanglewood appearance Friday night and will direct two concerts this coming weekend.

Biggest news of the afternoon was the impact of the chorus. Blessed with many young voices, its work was not merely accurate but tonally rich and endowed with complete command of widely varied dynamics. It was a joy to hear the lovely, floating soft high tones of the sopranos, and when the full power of a choral climax was unleashed, one could easily imagine that twice as many singers were on stage.

Gazette Review

The soloists, Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, Kenneth Riegel and Robert Hale, blended beautifully in quartet passages and ranged from adequacy to brilliance in solo assignments. Miss Valente had the best opportunities to shine. Miss Wolff's timbre was also highly satisfying. Riegel, heard in the Worcester 1970 "Messiah," produced perhaps too exposed a brilliance in his big solo. Hale was a dependalbe bass.

John Oliver, director of the chorus, shared plaudits with Davis.

Bishop, an American new to Boston and Tanglewood audiences, did his full share in making the Mozart piano concerto a thing of joy. Davis worked ardently with the orchestra to secure the life and accent essential to the ensemble score. Above this musicianly foundation, the soloist sang with complete freedom and unfailing charm. There was no attempt to make the music sound hard; its own winsomeness was sufficient and in the best of hands.

Davis took all the time in the world to shape his choral effects in the "Kyrie" and "Requiem." Beauty of tone was linked with deep religious meaning. The excitement of the "Day of Judgment" episodes was no more moving than the strong faith of passages voicing supplication of trust.

Mozart's tendency to use fugues at certain key moments lessened for this listener the spell cast by the choral tone, but the many moments of light and shade devised by the composer for the soloists and chorus made up a memorable experience.

High Attendence

High attendance for the past week was registered on Tuesday, when Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston "Pops." Threatened rain held off at the last moment and 9.626 came out, not as many as would have come had the sun shone all day.

Davis' Friday concert, with Zara Nelsova as cello soloist, drew only 4.426, and Bruno Maderna's Saturday all-orchestral concert 5.753. Maderna, pinch-hitting for William Steinberg, detained in Pittsburgh, changed the originally scheduled Hindemith to Mozart and continued to program Schuller's "Five Bagatelles" and the Brucker Seventh.

Tanglewood continues for two more weekends.

Davis Conducts Mozart

By DOROTHY STOWE

Colin Davis, the noted British conductor who has several times appeared as a guest on the Boston Symphony's podium, made his Tanglewood debut this past weekend. For his second appearance on Sunday afternoon Davis conducted an all-Mozart program, and proved himself to be the masterful interpreter of that composer which his reputation promised.

The major offering of the afternoon was the beautiful Requiem (K. 626). This work had been commissioned in the summer of 1791 by Count Walsegg. When Mozart died in December of that year at the age of thirty-five he had been unable to complete it, although it had been his obsessive desire to do so. There are no existing drafts for several of the movements, but most authorities theorize that he must have sung much of the mass during his last illness to his wife and his pupil Sussmayr, who was subsequently able to complete and orchestrate it for performance.

Under Davis' baton the work proved to be a successful fusion of all elements. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus (coached by John Oliver and the Boston Symphony, reduced to suitable Mozartean proportions, performed tellingly together. Especially moving was the beautiful soprano of Benita Valente, a voice ideally suited to the serene and soaring passages asigned to her. Soloist Beverly Wolff, Kenneth Riegel and Robert Hale also contributed effectively.

Davis' approach to the work is essentially English — a cool, cohesive performance with ideal tempi, which while often seemingly sparse somehow leaves one amply filled. Typical of this was the impression made by the beautiful Recordare solo quartet, poised and understated in its dynamics, which yet seemed deeply changed with the intercessions of the spirit.

Beginning with the tranquil requiem prayer and the clearly articulated fugal Kyrie, the performance rose to considerable heights of passion in the Dies Irae, characterized by a demonic vitality seldom associated with Mozart. The poignant Lacrimosa was of most moving effect, but to my Americanized mind the Domine Jesu and Hostias could have used a little more sense of desparation and urgency. Yet nothing could have improved the serenity of the Benedictus or the fulfillment of the fugal Kyrie, repeated at the end. One must agree that "out of tremor and guilt (this work) leads us gently toward peace and salvation."

Of special interest was the Boston Symphony debut of Stephen Bishop. This young Los Angeles borne pianist has spent considerable time in England, and yesterday performed as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C, K. 503. This concerto is little performed, and while not greatly distinctive from other Mozart concertos it afforded an excellent vehicle to display his fine sense of style and a good commanding concerto tone which carried well throughout the shed.

The opening selection of yesterday's concert was the Kyrie in D Minor, K. 341, performed by the chorus and orchestra. It is a gentle and confident work, composed by Mozart in his youth, and well presaged the spirit of the music to follow.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
AUG 10 1971
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Disappointment and Delight at Tanglewood

By Peter M. Knapp

Colin Davis conducted two of the three programs of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in Lenox this past weekend, concluding the Berkshire Festival's sixth week Sunday afternoon with an all-Mozart concert.

It was an ambitious program, including the Requiem, the Kyrie in d minor, K. 341, and the Piano Concerto in C, K. 503. And since Davis is highly regarded as a Mozart conductor, it looked like a winner.

Unfortunately, much of Sunday's program was a disappointment, though many of the 8,661 who attended in ideal weather apparently thought otherwise judging from the applause. But really, so much of the Requiem was swamped under overbearing choral sound from the over-large Tanglewood Festival Chorus and so few of the fine details emerged that one felt showered with choral fortes.

Balance obviously was one problem, with the orchestra sometimes disappearing under the choral weight. Clarity was another — few words or lines distinct, the sound becoming homogenized. Not everybody's fault, of course. In the fugue to the Kyrie, for example, the basses opened neatly and crisply, only to have weak altos muddy the counterpoint. The same section was immeasurably better in its return at the end.

The English conductor seems to like his Mozart on a robust scale with full-bodied sound. He can hold large forces together, though with more massed effect than linear clarity, and for the most part chooses sensible tempi.

His Requiem had its moments of force, but largely missing was the sense of awe and mystery Mozart put into this profound piece of music. One point where that did emerge was in the Recordare, where Davis had the solo quartet sing very softly to good effect (and welcome contrast). The soloists' Benedictus also went well.

The soloists were soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel and bass Robert Hale (a former Wollaston resident while a student at the New England Conservatory), and aside from a few raw attacks by the tenor their singing was effective and shapely.

Majestic Kyrie

As a companion to the Requiem, the earlier Kyrie in d minor opened the program. It is a majestic, serene and mostly homophonic piece built around descending lines and composed some 11 years before the Requiem. Here, the chorus sang firmly and the forces were well balanced.

In the concerto, the 31-year-old Californian, Stephen Bishop was the soloist. K. 503 is one of Mozart's late, "big" concerti richly scored for strings, winds, trumpets and timpani. Its first movement is rugged and inventive, built around a strongly rhythmic fanfare-like motif. Bishop's playing on the other hand was small-scale, almost dainty — a curious response to the nature of the piece and to Davis' hearty accompaniment.

Surely, this concerto calls for a more forceful solo approach and a less tinkly tone. The piano sounded as if it had been prepared. And while Bishop can cover the keyboard well and composed tasteful cadenzas, much of his playing lacked personality or profile.

Bruckner and Maderna

Saturday's concert, attended by 5,753 on a lushly moonlit evening, turned out to be a triumph for composer Anton Bruckner and conductor Bruno Maderna. The Italian musician, one of the continent's foremost avant-garde composer-conductors, is spending the summer on the Tanglewood faculty, and earlier in the season had led an impressive concert.

Saturday night, Maderna was serving as a replacement for BSO Music Director William Steinberg. This switch was attributed in the program insert to "scheduling difficulties." Another version was that Steinberg had been recalled to Pittsburgh for acoustical tests on the Symphony's new hall. Whatever the reason, Steinberg left the Boston Symphony in very capable hands, as Maderna again was an authoritative conductor with imaginative ideas and the gift of drawing magnificent playing from the orchestra. The musicians seem happy and comfortable with him.

Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E was the climactic event on a program also containing works by Mozart and Gunther Schuller. At the end, there was an uproar of cheers, Maderna was recalled many times and the musicians joined in the applause — even to the unusual display of stamping their feet in accolade.

Justifying The Response

Buckner doesn't often generate this kind of response, but for a performance of this vitality, intelligence and aural beauty it was fully justified. The Seventh, with its eloquent grandeur, melodic richness and powerful homage to Wagner in the adagio, is perhaps Bruckner's most accessible symphony for all its length and its typically Bruckernian thoroughness of developing thematic motifs.

Maderna's approach was the antithesis of the super-sober, deliberately-paced Bruckner one often hears. Before the performance, someone remarked that Maderna probably played it 23 minutes faster than Steinberg! That's an exaggeration of course, but Maderna's pacing did move briskly and in some episodes, unusually swiftly.

More to the point, however, is that his conception had great flexibility without losing the symphony's structural shape. Maderna is a conductor who knows the value of shaping phrases across bar lines and who is unafraid of the give-and-take of rubato. One might question some of his ideas about tempi in individual sections of this symphony, but all-over this performance is best remembered for its clarity, incisiveness of details, sense of motion and emotion without banal sentiment, and the transcendental sound of the orchestra.

Uncluttered Conceptions

The program began with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony, No. 38 in D, K.504 (replacing the Hindemith Concert Music for String Orchestra and Brass Instruments scheduled by Steinberg), again in a performance of clear, uncluttered sound (though not without some flaws of execution in the first movement) and deftly-turned details. The string playing for the most part was limber and relaxed. The introductory adagio, however, lacked weight and drama, Maderna taking this dark episode in a subdued, matter-of-fact fashion.

Also performed were Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra, brief Webernesque essays in contrasting musical elements — sonority, rhythm, dynamics — that demonstrate Schuller's keen ear for putting together interesting sonorities without much arresting content. The composer bounded onstage to accept warm applause and seemed enthusiastic about Maderna's cleanly-ordered direction.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 9 1971
New England Newsclip

Music Review

All-Mozart at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH Tanglewood weekend introduced a new conductor, Colin Davis, to the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon audiences and presented another, Bruno Maderna, making his second appearance on this podium.

The programs were above ordinary. Davis concentrated on Mozart yesterday afternoon and allotted half of Friday's concert to the music of his countrymen, Sir Edward Elgar and Hugh Wood. Maderna presented the first performance of these festivals of Gunther Schuller's Five Bagatelles for Orchestra and the huge Bruckner Symphony No. 7 in E.

Davis immediately impressed his listeners with his straightforward attitude toward the music at hand. The Elgar Introduction and Allegro for Strings enlists a quartet of soloists, but its lush texture and gorgeous sonority are of a kind into which musicians like to sink their teeth. The Bostonian strings went after it with relish and made it glow. It has a character which Vaughan Williams later may well have emulated in his "Tallis" theme. The soloists were the first chair men of the orchestra's string sections, but all were not equally effective in the pseudo Welsh tune which becomes the main theme. In spite of the diatonic restrictions with which contemporary composers believe themselves hampered, it is remarkable what eloquence can still be achieved in traditional discourse.

Davis ended his evening with the 7th Symphony of Dvorak, Opus 70, in D Minor. Dvorak was no experimenter. He was a lovable man, and he expressed musically the simple beauty which pervaded his nature and which most often emanated from the soil of his native land. There are no problems, psychologically or even harmonically. No anguish even in his nostalgic images.

This mood was far removed from that of the cello concerto of Hugh Wood, which Zara Nelsova played so heroically in mid-concert. Wood, born in 1932, is a confessed adherent of the Schoenberg principle, but he uses it to express unrelieved stress and never for mere academic indebtedness. Miss Nelsova played with positive conviction. A long solo introduction is sparsely joined by the winds to which immediate relevance is not in evidence. Miss Nelsova's tone and powerful bow were consummately adequate to cope with the massive cooperation Wood enforces on the orchestra as the single movement concerto progresses. Davis controlled the irregular metric pattern with ease and certainty.

* * *

SATURDAY night, Bruno Maderna, who had conducted one of the earlier concerts this season, took over on short notice from William Steinberg. He adhered to the original program except for the substitution of a Mozart symphony, the "Prague" No. 38 in D (K504), to replace Hindemith's "Concert Music."

The main part of the evening was devoted to the Bruckner 7th Symphony in E, and Maderna set a track record. Steinberg took well over an hour to do it in Paris in May. Maderna did it here in 55 minutes. It must be the water.

Whitestone

Colin Davis

Yet he scored deeply in the magnificent sounds Bruckner makes possible in so many episodes of this symphony. But early in the first movement, where Bruckner indicated that he would like it to be reposeful (ruhig), Maderna gamboled like a faun at eve. The conductor can be excused if he didn't effect some of the sudden changes of dynamics. There were enough opulent rewards to make the performance seem timeless. To name but one, the dirge-like theme of the Adagio, Bruckner's greatest page, was played by the violas and tenor tubas with lasting impact and when all the strings, but especially the firsts, attack the rising three-note figure on a rising major third on the higher registers of the G string, one heard the glory of the Boston orchestra at its finest.

Gunther Schuller is unduly diffident in entitling his five short sketches for orchestra "Bagatelles." Especially in Maderna's hands they have more significance than trifles. Essentially, however, they are exercises in orchestral research, testing antipodal registers under various chapters. Some are quiet and without rhythmic momentum, others are brash, relying heavily on the brass and percussion. Schuller writes less well, it would appear, for the strings than for the winds. At least he favors them less, although he gave them their best opportunity in the third Bagatelle. But mainly there are dabs of tone, splashes of exclamations and little superficial cohesion.

* * *

YESTERDAY afternoon Davis was the conductor in a Mozart program of which the major work was the great Requiem. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor, responded to Davis's inspired direction with superbly alert tonal variety. The four distinguished soloists, Benita Valente, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass, complemented the performance both singly and in their ensembles.

Davis uses plenty of muscular tension in his conducting manner, but he is totally concerned in conveying his valid wishes to the performers. He succeeds admirably. It is remarkable how dramatically effective the Requiem is in a concert hall, just as it is solemnly appropriate in a setting where the Boston Symphony performed in January of 1964, in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston to honor the memory of President Kennedy.

Memorable was the Kyrie Eleison leading from the Introitus and soon succeeding in the Tuba Mirum. Equally telling in another sound effect was the restrained Domine Jesu and the Hostias.

Mozart uses an unusual orchestra for his Requiem, employing only basset horns and bassoons from the reeds. The basset horns, tenor clarinets in F, were played by Pasquale Cardillo and Felix Viscuglia. He also uses trumpets and trombones, and the usual strings and organ. In several instances, the tympani are given special emphasis, but there are few purely orchestral statements in the whole work.

After the opening Kyrie in D Minor (K.341), Stephen Bishop was the soloist in the C major piano concerto (K.503). He enunciated a performance of rare distinction, highlighted by tonal splendor. Davis gave him fastidious support.

THE WEEKEND Prelude offered the purchasers of the Friday night orchestra seats the bonus of a short recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin. In addition to her many attributes as an artist, Miss Curtin is not surpassed as a constructor of programs. She divided her concert, all sung in German, into two sections. The first consisted of five songs of Schubert, Liszt, Strauss and Bach, all of which contained the avowal "thou art" (du bist) in the opening line of its poem.

Miss Curtin makes a regal appearance and is at the peak of her artistic maturity. In voice production, control of nuance and validity of taste, she made each of her dozen songs a gem. The second half of the program had an additional fillip by the rendition of the "Seven Early Songs" of Alban Berg, each to a verse by a different poet.

The collaboration of Ryan Edwards at the piano fortified the impression Miss Curtin made in every song, not least in the "Night" in which the Debussyesque misty floating of Berg's mood with Hauptmann's poem were infallibly conveyed by both voice and piano. Equally faithfully realized was the same suite's "Traumgekront" (Crowned with dreams), in which Berg melded his vein with Rilke's text and which were thoroughly penetrated by Miss Curtin and her accompanist.

The artists graciously bowed to the insistent demands of their audience and added songs of Perceval, Ginastera, Joaquin Nin, Virgil Thompson, Poulenc and Villa-Lobos. The audience would not be surfeited and only the fact that the hall had been rented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 8 on determined the conclusion of Miss Curtin's efforts.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,034

AUG 10 1971

Concert at Tanglewood Scales Music Spectrum

By LAURIE MODELL

In music, as in all other art forms, there is the necessity for that intangible something that has been inadequately called inspiration. It is this which separates a good performance from a superlative one, an interesting composition from a work of genius, and it is this which is the basis for music being described as an 'affecting' art.

* * *

Sunday at Tanglewood was a case in point: it offered both performances that for this listener were acceptable, even interesting, but unaffecting; and then, as if to accentuate the contrasts, it presented us with an emotional blockbuster of an experience — the Mozart Requiem.

Preceding the Requiem on the all-Mozart program were the Kyrie in D minor, K. 341, and the Piano Concerto No. 25 in C, K. 503. Both were agreeable works for Sunday afternoon listening — the Kyrie is a short, somber work for chorus and orchestra and conductor Colin Davis asked for, and got in full measure, a rich warm sound from the chorus that was very pleasing.

The same pleasing effect could be found in the piano concerto in which Stephen Bishop was featured soloist. Although he at times used what seemed like a bit too much pedal for clarity, he steadily improved as the work progressed; what had at first seemed blurry and a bit soft (even for Mozart, whom everyone assumes lately requires delicacy above all else) gradually became enunciated and more sharply etched. The third movement is very robust Mozart and Mr. Bishop unfortunately didn't seem to come to grips with that fact until well into it. But when he became good, he was really good, and the ovation he received at the end was long and well deserved.

Surely, however, the highlight of the afternoon, and perhaps of the summer, was an absolutely exquisite performance of the Requiem. Colin Davis seemed most at home in this largely choral work, and his interpretation was remarkably evocative of the feeling of the mass, that of faith in God and a plea for salvation. Mozart composed this just before he died (it was in fact completed after his death by a friend from sketches he'd left) and it is alleged that he envisioned the work as a mass for his own approaching death. It is remarkably vivid in depicting in music that which is depicted in the text: for example, on the words 'salva me' (save me) the music went from a huge fortissimo to a bare whisper of pleading; and similarly on the words 'cremer igne' (everlasting fire) the music swelled suddenly to terrifying proportions.

In this, one must commend the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and director John Oliver for what must have been very intense preparation. Their diction was excellent everywhere and they sang with great excitement and feeling. Colin Davis let no subtlety in the music go by unnoticed and some of the effects, especially those concerning the wrath of God, were really thrilling. Soloists for the work were Benita Valente, soprano, Beverly Wolff, contralto, Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass, and all sang with warmth and sensitivity, although their diction was not nearly as precise as that of the chorus.

Next weekend's concerts will be conducted by Colin Davis and Seiji Ozawa with guest soloists Judith Raskin and Christoph Eschenbach.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 12 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend

TANGLEWOOD
Aug. 6 Concert
By J.H.

Elgar, Wood, and Dvorak — not a menu to draw a crowd — and it did not. Colin Davis, conductor of the BBC Symphony, brought with him two compositions from his native land. One pleased the sparse audience and the other failed.

Mr. Davis showed that he has a flair for Elgar in the lush-sounding Introduction and Allegro for Strings. The piece contains some fine string writing, enhanced by a charming Welsh folk tune. Inspired by these elements and Mr. Davis' genuine interpretation, the strings of the Boston Symphony displayed a rare sensitivity to the varying moods and lyrical lines of the work, surrounding the whole with as warm a sound as has been heard from them.

Hugh Wood says that Schoenberg's style is a part of him and that he is 'put off' by what has come after. Wood's Cello Concerto, Op. 12, is, therefore, a long 12-tone movement gone inanely romantic. Cellist Zara Nelsova inspired my compassion. Her big singing tone and subtle phrasing was used by the composer to repeat, until dead, a silly three-note figure until the end of the work brought relief to all.

Dvorak's big Seventh Symphony in D comprised the second half of the evening. While it had lots of energy, moments of beauty, and effective shifts of mood and texture, it did not quite jell.

Aug. 7 Concert
By F.G.C.

Due to scheduling difficulties, William Steinberg was unable to conduct Saturday's Tanglewood performance. Bruno Maderna, the Italian composer-conductor, took over, substituting the Mozart Prague Symphony for the Hindemith work. It was Mozart with a decided emphasis on the lyrical nature of the work, and the result was truly fascinating. While purists might have been offended by the unabashedly lush playing in places, and hoped for the lean, crisp Mozart interpretations so popular now, we saw the piece from a new dimension.

Gunther Schuller's music is among the most accessible of contemporary compositions, and his excellent Five Bagatelles for Orchestra is a case in point. Each of the first four bagatelles emphasizes a different compositional device, and the last bagatelle combines aspects of the first four.

The Bruckner Seventh Symphony is a massive, complex work; it received a superb performance, and was the high point of the evening. Maderna emphasized the melodic ideas of the work (and there are many!); he was able to sustain intense listener interest throughout the lengthy work, an accomplishment in itself. The orchestra's playing was magnificent, particularly in the choral-like sections of the second and fourth movements, and the lively third movement.

Aug. 8 Concert
By J.H.

The head swims after two hours of such meaty Mozart as was heard Sunday. Relief came in the very gay allegretto of the Piano Concerto in C, K. 503, marking a rest from the surrounding produndities.

The piano soloist, Stephen Bishop, displayed a nice sense of structure in the rich first movement, supplying his own cadenza which was an engaging little development of Mozart's material. Conductor Colin Davis' orchestral accompaniment was especially good in the tutti passages, but at other times his approach was more appropriate for a baroque concerto grosso, as details were sacrificed to the piano.

The two choral works on the program, the Kyrie in D minor by the young Mozart and his Requiem, his last work, share a sublime seriousness which belies their chronology. Mr. Davis gave a studied, understated reading of both works which while very moving, lacked some of the intensity they can produce. The Benedictus and Agnus Dei did have this electricity, but the spark flickered in the Cum Sanctus.

All four soloists, soprano Benita Valente, contralto Beverly Wolff, tenor Kenneth Riegel, and bass Robert Hale were splendid. It was Miss Valente, however, who made the very difficult seem the easiest and most beautiful.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 13 1971

New England Newsclip

Concert Review

Boston Symphony Orchestra At The Berkshire Festival

By Martha deB. Beaver

During the sixth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening responded with unrelenting fervor to the musically sound and dynamically alert direction of Bruno Madenra.

His second appearance this summer, it was an unexpected pleasure, as Maderna replaced William Steinberg, "due to scheduling difficulties," although we understand the underlying reason was a health precaution. Except for Hindemith's concert music for strings and brass, which he replaced with Mozart's Prague Symphony, the conductor retained the planned program, Schuller's Five bagatelles for orchestra, a first performance at the Festival and Bruckner's seventh symphony.

There was no doubt about the mutual subjection of orchestra and conductor in revealing the stylistic and dynamic aspects of the music at nand. Mozart's work was unusually articulate, Schuller's exploratory potpourri of rhythmic and tonal conceptions in his finely structured and brief abstractions outlined with considerate clarity.

Depth Of Perception

Maderna presented the Bruckner with a depth of perception one hasn't been subjected to since Charles Munch, a free exploration of tempi, which this work demands, an increasingly impassioned secular aura surpassing the solemnity of the sacred. At the close of the magnificently propelled finale (the brass choir was never better) an unprecedented outburst of applause and vocal acclaim from wildly tumultous audience must be recorded as the greatest given any conductor this season, even Bernstein.

Sunday's all-Mozart program was almost a complete let down, except for the opening Kyrie in D minor, K.341, simplistically styled and formed by Colin Davis, and parts of the D minor Requiem Mass, the composer's last work. It was written during a period of increasing ill-health from which Mozart finally succumbed, leaving his composition unfinished.

Eminent English conductor, noted for his Mozart interpretations, Mr. Davis didn't seem able to lift the orchestra to any spectacular heights. Although the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, trained by John Olver, responded with eagerness and fairly articulate evocation, the balance between players and voices was unfortunate in that the former were often unheard, and the number of choral singers made it difficult to distinguish very clearly fugal passages in the Kyrie and Cum sanctis tuis of the Lux aeterna.

We did find the Tuba Mirum, progressively effective, with bass soloist Robert Hale rather throaty at first, but gradually clearing in those harmonic reaches so Mozartean, tenor Kenneth Riegel in his Mors Stupebit dramatically lyrical, contralto Beverly Wolff warmly resonant with her succeeding Judex ergo, and the plaintive Quid sum miser of soprano Benita Valenta full of musicianly grace.

The chorus too sounded forcefully expressive throughout the moody Rex Tremendae, the quartet contrastingly quiet and peaceful singing the Recordare, Jesu pie.

After a labored Hostias the chorus redeemed itself with an exultant Sanctus, and the soli made a flowing portrayal of the modulations connecting their successive Benedictus solos.

Valente's Lux aeterna was indeed a shining light preceding the final triumphant and resigned requiem of the Communio. Somehow this moving composition, full of Mozart's high ethics and fearless attitude toward death (part of his Masonic beliefs) seemed to surmount any failings on the part of its interpretation by Mr. Davis. It is possible that he concentrated too much on the chorus, almost ignoring the chamber orchestra (concertmaster Joseph Silverstein gave many discreet indications for entrances and dynamics). After their Saturday evening performance they may have needed more directorial inspiration.

Unsatisfied

Although the program notes noted that "at the end (of the C major piano concerto K.503) we are left, as with every great experience, wanting more, at the same time completely satisfied" we were completely unsatisfied, even disturbed, with young Stephen Bishop's unmusical performance.

Almost constant pedaling obscured the unique polyphony of the first movement, even the simple melodic themes, which the excellence of the orchestral background couldn't dispel. The pianist's own cadenza, well-constructed, suffered from a lack of knowlegeable balance, right hand drowning out the left hand's important theme.

Bishop did remedy his pedaling in the following movements but the ravishing octave figure in the midst of the second was only suggested, and the flute's echo at one point completely obliterated, although the woodwind's similar imitation later was clear. Gaiety and bounce were lacking in the final rondo; in fact, so much of the concerto was stylistically grounded (and technically uneven) that one marveled in disbelief at this utter disregard of a composer's supreme achievement.

84

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000
AUG 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Program Next Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, August 13, 1971 at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier." Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the Orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, August 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Mr. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsal are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Saturday evening, August 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, August 15 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Zenakis' Polla Ta Dina, followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique."

SEVENTH WEEK BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Friday, August 13

7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH pianist
Beethoven: Piano sonata in B-flat Op. 106 'Hammerklavier'

9:00 p.m. Shed
COLIN DAVIS conductor
4 soloists to be announced
TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS
Schubert: Mass in G
Elgar: Symphony no. 1

Saturday, August 14

10:30 a.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal

8:30 p.m. Shed
COLIN DAVIS conductor
JUDITH RASKIN soprano
Mozart: Symphony no. 39 in E-flat K. 543
Mahler: Symphony no. 4

Sunday, August 15

2:30 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH pianist
Xenakis: Polla Ta Dina
Beethoven: Piano concerto no. 1
Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 6 'Pathetique'

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,245
AUG 11 1971

Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday at 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude with Christoph Eschenbach. 9 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra, Colin Davis conducting Schubert and Elgar. Saturday at 10:30 a.m., Open Rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts Mozart, Mahler with Judith Raskin. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts: Xenakis, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky.

Summer Folklore Concert Series at the Lenox Arts Center. Joan Baez. Saturday and Sunday.

DALTON NEWS RECORD
DALTON, MASS.
W. 2,300
AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Lists Busy Program for Aug. 13 to 15

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, August 13, 1971 at 9 p.m. in the shed. Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G,K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier."

Saturday evening, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony with soprano Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 1. Following intermission, Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique."

7th WEEKEND

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,075 SUN. 145,169
AUG 8 1971

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD—Lenox, Mass. Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. Christopher Eschenbach. At 9 p.m. Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Schubert: Mass in G major. Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Elgar: Symphony no. 1. Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducts. Mozart: Symphony no. 39. Mahler: Symphony no. 4. Judith Raskin Next Sunday Seiji Ozawa conducts at 2:30 p.m. Xenakis: Polla Ta Dina. Beethoven: Piano Concerto no. 1. Christopher Eschenback, Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 6 'Pathetique.'

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 6,795
AUG 12 1971 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Tanglewood Music Festival continues in Lenox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, music director. The program this weekend: Friday, 9 p.m. Davis, Schubert, Mass in G Major and Elgar, Symphony No. 1. Saturday, 8:30 p.m. Davis, Mozart, Symphony No. 39, and Mahler, Symphony No. 4, Judith Raskin; Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Ozawa, Xenakis, Polla Ta Dina; Beethoven, Piano concerto No. 1, Christoph Eschenback, and Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 'Pathetique'.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.
W. 4,162
AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Seventh Week Of Berkshire Music

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, August 13, 1971 at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed. He will lead a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director.

The second half of the concert is devoted to Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B- flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier." Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the Orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, August 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Mr. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Saturday evening, August 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, August 15 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1. After the intermission, Mr. Ozawa will direct a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique."

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS
S. 260,961
AUG 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Soprano Benita Valente will be soloist at Tanglewood today in a performance of Mozart's Requiem. Colin Davis will conduct the all-Mozart program which will also include Stephen Bishop as piano soloist.

BSO to perform Schubert's Mass

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday, Aug. 13, at 9 p.m. in the shed.

Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The weekend prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, "Hammerklavier."

Saturday morning, Aug. 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony open rehearsal. Ozawa rehearses the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Saturday, Aug. 14, at 8:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony.

On Sunday, Aug. 15, at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1, Following intermission, Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique."

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 415,231
AUG 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Schubert Mass At Tanglewood

Colin Davis will conduct a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, on Friday evening at Tanglewood in Lenox.

On Saturday morning Tanglewood Artistic Director, season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

AUG 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Soloists shine in 7th weekend at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, Aug. 13, at 9 p.m. in the shed.

Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The weekend prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier." Weekend prelude concerts are held at 7 each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Guest artists and members of the orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, Aug. 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Ozawa rehearses the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal are $2.50 and benefit the orchestra's pension fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the festival ticket office.

Saturday evening, Aug. 14 at 8:30 in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15 at 2:30 in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
S. 56,837

AUG 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Conducts At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD — Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed. Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christopher Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier." Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Saturday evening, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the orchestra with soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 40,675

AUG 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Conducts At Candlewood

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier." Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the Orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Mr. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' Polla Ta Dina, followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique."

BIG OUTPUT EXPECTED

URUACU, Brazil — An asbestos mine being opened near here is expected to produce about 17,000 long tons a year, more than doubling Brazil's present production.

GASTROLITHS

Gizzard stones from dinosaurs' stomachs, called gastroliths, are found in fossil beds in northwest Colorado.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Colin Davis To Lead Tanglewood Concert

LENOX — Colin Davis will conduct the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Aug. 13 at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Weekend Prelude, Aug. 13 at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B- flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier," Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7, each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert.

Guest artists and members of the orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Aug. 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Ozawa rehearses the orchestra in music for the following day's concert.

Tickets for the Open Rehearsal are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Davis conducts the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Aug. 15 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," and then Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 1.

After intermission, Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique,"

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Ozawa and Davis On BFC Programs

Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday, Aug. 13 at 8 p.m. in the Shed, Tanglewood, Lenox.

Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier."

Wwekend Prelude concerts are held at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, Aug. 14, Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony open rehearsal. Ozawa rehearses the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal benefit the orchestra's pension fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Tkcket Office.

Saturday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday, Aug. 15 at 2:30 p,m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 1. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique."

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 12 1971

Davis Will Conduct Tanglewood Concert

Colin Davis conducts Schubert's Mass in G with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus as the opening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The second half of the 9 p.m. Friday concert in the Shed is devoted to Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. Friday in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat "Hammerklavier." Weekend prelude concerts are free to Friday evening ticket holders.

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, conducts the open rehearsal Saturday morning. He will rehearse the orchestra in music for the following day's concert.

Davis conducts the orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin in the Saturday evening 8:30 program including Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and Mahler's Fourth Symphony.

Sunday afternoon, Ozawa conducts the symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The 2:30 p.m. concert begins with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Bethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, "Pathetique."

86

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 10,500

AUG 10 1971

Colin Davis To Conduct At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.–Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday, Aug. 13, 1971 at 9 p.m. in the shed.

Davis conducts a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, directs.

The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

The weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier."

Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guests artists and members of the orchestra are presented in short recital programs at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning Tanglewood artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, conducts the season's seventh Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal. Ozawa, rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsal are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert includes Xenakis' Polla Ta Dina. Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 1. and Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony. "Pathetique."

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 12 1971

New England Newsclip

Two Great Soloists at Tanglewood

Colin Davis will conduct the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 13 at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Mr. Davis will conduct a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167, with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. tomorrow evening in the shed will be a piano recital by Christopher Eschenbach, performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106, "Hammerklavier."

The weekend prelude concerts are held at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's artistic director, will conduct the season's seventh Boston Symphony open rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 14 for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival Ticket Office.

JUDITH RASKIN . . . will be the soprano soloist Saturday, Aug. 14 in Mahler's Symphony no. 4 at Tanglewood.

COLIN DAVIS . . . will conduct this weekend at Tanglewood.

Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra Saturday evening with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program opens with Mozart's Symphony no. 39, and concludes with a performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, also with Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon's program, at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, will present Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony with piano soliist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert begins with Xenakis' Polla Ta Dina, followed by Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa will conduct a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, Pathetique.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

AUG 12 1971

SOLOIST. Judith Raskin,, soprano, will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Colin Davis, for its performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 4 at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
24,500

AUG 12 1971

New England Newsclip

Soprano Raskin Lenox Soloist In Mahler's Fourth

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox—Colin Davis conducts the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, Aug. 13, at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Program includes Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 and Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

JUDITH RASKIN

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed is a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106, "Hammerklavier". Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the Orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

Saturday morning, Aug. 14, Seiji Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets are $2.50 and benefit the Pension Fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, Aug. 4 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Colin Davis conducts Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and Mahler's Fourth symphony, with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15 at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts, with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. Concert begins with Xenakis' Polla Ta Dina, followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1 and Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony, 'Pathetique".

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

AUG 8 1971

New England Newsclip

JUDITH RASKIN will sing in performance of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, directed by Colin Davis at Tanglewood, Saturday.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 8 1971

New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Judith Raskin Soloist

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Colin Davis will conduct the opening concert of the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Friday evening, Aug. 13, 1971 at 9:00 p.m. in the Shed.

He will conduct a performance of Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167 with four soloists and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director. The second half of the concert is devoted to a performance of Elgar's Symphony no. 1.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7:00 p.m. in the Shed will be a piano recital by Christoph Eschenbach performing Beethoven's Sonata in B-flat, Op. 106 "Hammerklavier."

Weekend Prelude concerts are held at 7:00 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Guest artists and members of the Orchestra are presented in short recital programs offered at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

JUDITH RASKIN

Saturday morning, Aug. 14, Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa, will conduct the season's seventh Symphony open rehearsal. Ozawa will rehearse the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's pension fund. They are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at the Festival ticket office.

Saturday evening, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Davis will conduct the Orchestra with soprano soloist Judith Raskin. The program will open with Mozart's Symphony no. 39 and conclude with a performance of Mahler's Fourth symphony with soloist Raskin.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, Ozawa will conduct the Symphony with piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach. The concert will begin with Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina," followed by Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 1. Following intermission, Ozawa will conduct a performance of Tchaikovsky's Sixth symphony, "Pathetique."

Soprano Soloist

Judith Raskin will be the soprano soloist at Tanglewood under the baton of Colin Davis in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 4 on Saturday, August 14, at 8:30 pm in the Tanglewood Shed. Tanglewood is near Lenox, Mass.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

AUG 6 1971

New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Davis Conducts Mahler's Fourth at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Most remarkable feat of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend at Tanglewood was Colin Davis' conducting of the Boston Symphony Saturday night in Mahler's Fourth Symphony.

Just as vivid but on the opposite side of the ledger was a flood of contemporary riddling called "Polla ta dina" (Wonders are many), with which conductor Seiji Ozawa engaged the orchestra and 35 members of the Berkshire Boy Choir yesterday afternoon.

It was the first United States performance.

Composer of "Polla" is Iannis Xenakis, a 49-year-old Roumanian of Greek parentage.

Weekend total attendance was 26,309.

On Friday night, Davis' skill couldn't pull Elgar's First Symphony out of the mediocrity in which it is rooted.

Mahler's Fourth is the most mercifully brief of his symphonies. It takes a little under an hour to play and avoids most of the composer's usually shattering and long-winded soliloquies.

Even the repetitious and stretched third movement was a gorgeous panorama of sounds under the influence of Davis and the Boston Symphony.

Soprano Judith Raskin endowed the lyrical solo of the fourth movement with such a lovely voice and feeling that the German purple prose was of little consequence. As an angel, she tells of good things of heavenly existence. These range from fine asparagus to Saint Ursula's smile.

Davis' concept of the first movement was transient, securely bound moods, bucolic atmosphere and steadfast drive to a bursting climax.

Elasticity

Instead of driving through the scherzo-like second movement like a metronome, Davis gave it elasticity. Solos had individuality and sound patterns could register.

The beautiful opening melody of the third movement led to one of the most luscious recitals of glowing sound in this festival.

Davis would have been as vital with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat if the corchestra had matched his expertise. At that, his final curtain call for the Mozart was demanded with rhythmic clapping.

Best of the Mozart was the finale. At such a clip, a lesser orchestra would have turned it into a shambles.

Yesterday afternoon, Ozawa jarred his audience of 10,297 with Xenakis' ten-minute wonder — then returned to normal with Beethoven's First Piano Concerto, Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, "Pathetique" Symphony.

Such a straightlaced enactment of the Tchaikovsky potboiler provided its own built-in drama. The audience loved it.

It can be assumed that much of the applause for "Polla ta dina" (based on Sophocles' "Antigone") was for the boy choir. The composer gave the stalwart lads but one note to sing throughout so their success had to rely on quality and clarity of text.

In the background were shrill reeds, sustained tones in bass, glissandos, uncommon instrumental mixtures. Organization of this heady broth was controlled from the podium and by voices.

There was enough going to counteract boredom. Sophocles made himself quite clear but one might have wondered what in thunder Xenakis was trying to say.

The orchestra gave Eschenbach a streamlined introduction and accompaniment.

Eschenbach's playing of the Beethoven Concerto was an unbroken chain of exactitudes. Every note was made to fit snugly in place. Phrases were finely polished. Tempos of the first and third movements were not raced but allowed the soloist to display his first-class technique. In the slow movement, pianist and orchestra achieved an expressive, crystaline-clear singing tone.

The soloist was rewarded with heavy applause and shouts.

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Colin Davis, conductor
Symphony No. 39 in E flat major, K 543 Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in G major Mahler
Judith Raskin, soprano
Sunday Afternoon
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
Polla ta Dina Xeankis
Berkshire Boy Choir
Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major, Opus 15 Beethoven
Christoph Eschenbach, pianist
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74, "Pathetique" Tchaikovsky

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,679 SUN. 115,160
AUG 16 1971

Leads Boston in Mozart, Mahler

Colin Davis Warms a Tanglewood Audience

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

It was a cool evening in the Berkshire Hills Saturday night until Volin Davis stooped to the font of the Boston Orchestra and raised the temperature several degrees.

Tee program was Mozart's Symphony No 39 in E Flat K. 543, and Mahler's Symphony no 4 in G with Judith Raskin as soprano soloist.

DAVIS HAS had a very impressive summer at Tanglewood and shows a definite affinity for Mozart and very particularly an affinity for the great choral works.. It appears that the orchestra feels empathetic towards the man and certainly the audiences have been very demonstrative, giving Davis call after call.

His reading of the Mozart, one of the marvelous final three symphoniesMozart composed in one summer a year beforr he died, was meticulous and respertful without being maudlin or deferential just because it was Mozart.

It staggers the mind when one considers that Mozart composed Symphoneiee Nos. 39, 40, and 41, in such a short time and for no overt reason, like a commission, which of course, he sorely needed. But it is a measure of his genious that he did just that and thesee three works number among his greatest works.

SOMETHING INSPIRED him to this and it will remain one of the great mysteries of his life as to exactly what it was. Without funds, his reputation and desirability as a pianist and composer stagnating, the E Flat is a marvel of lightness and spirit and grace. And this is the mannerin which Davis conducted it.

Te Mahler is another lighthearted and simple work and if, (to be sure) Mahler was no Mozart, he had his moments.

I must state straight on that I am not a member of the buregoningMahler cult led by head cultist Leonard Berstein, but the music is worthy and at times first rate.

JUDITH RASKIN sang the last movement in a proper manner, her voice was clear and focused, quite at home both musically ad in terms of the text.

Joseph Silverstein again proved his superior mettle with a moving solo in the "scherzo."

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 21 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Review

Exquisite sound, the usual norm for the Boston Symphony, taxed to its ultimate producing one of the most memorable concerts of this or any season and concluded the next to final weekend of summer concerts and conclided the next to final weekend of summer concerts at Tanglewood, Aug. 13-15 — Colin Davis, guest conductor performed a masterly service both to audience and orchestra in the Mozart 39th in E Flat Symphony, and the Mahler 4th in G. on Saturday.

Seiji Ozawa, co-director at Tanglewood, conducted the Xenakis' first performance in the United States of the "Polla ta dina" with the Berkshire Boy Choir, the Beethoven piano concerto no I in C with Christoph Eschenbach and the Tchaikovsky symphony in 6 for the Sunday P. M. concert.

Too much can not be said favorable for the entire. The Mahler, entitled simple-hearted straightforward lyrical music evokes a spirit of gaiety without any vestige of superficiality, but in joy; mixed with theoretical themes, songs from century old German folk tunes, and a sunny serenity of dreams of exaltation in heavenly bliss symphony was he regarded as a serious composer, and though the deep soul-searching stirrings are saved for his later works, none can be more exquisite in sound or leave one with greater joy in listening. The applause and bravos were deafening at the conclusion, and only praise was heard from the lips of the auditors in conclusion. The Mozara, 39, one of the three composed in an apparent freedom from a commissioned work a new beauty, a new development, and an apparent freedom from a commissioned work to which he was often driven through sheer need: it is light and joyous, and a favorite through familiarity through its piano arrangements.

Iannis Xenakis, born 1922, in Romania of Great parentage wrote his "Wonders are Many" or Polla ta dina in 1962. The words are sung by the children choir in this performance by the Berkshire Boy's choir) one note; the orchestra variations providing the cotrast. The words from Sophocles Antigone are best stated in the program notes as a "College of sounds", sweeping glissandi and sharp punctuations, closely approximateing electronic music". . . Sounds depicting and thoughts from the translation of the original poem wonders of man, power of the sea and wind, the soil, horses, poughs, birds, savage beasts that man has learned to conquor and control by speech and through which bring him both to evil and to good. If you would hear this sound, this translation via the seven note scale in a composite of orchestral variation. . is a must in the realm of the newer listening.

Christoph Eschenback played a beautiful conception of the Beethoven first piano concerto. A graduate from the Hamburg Music Academy with highest honors, he was winner of the Steinway Young Pianists competition in 1951 and 52 among others. He has appeared with leading orchestra of Europe and North America and solo recitals in many parts of the world. Judith Raskin, who sang the solo finale in the Mahler 4th, has sung at Tanglewood, and with the NBC opera, the Santa Fe opera and the American opera society. Her voice is unexcelled in clarity, purity and sheer beauty.

R.E. Houghton

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend

Some 26,279 heard the seventh weekend of concerts at Tanglewood. The figure was down somewhat from last year's 32,510.

The Friday night concert attracted 3,243; Saturday's open rehearsal, 4,725 and evening performance 8,014; and the Sunday afternoon concert, 10,297.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Schubert, Mahler by Colin Davis

By Louis Snyder
Lenox, Mass.

Colin Davis concluded his first appearances at Tanglewood conducting Boston Symphony concerts on last Friday and Saturday evenings. Schubert's ethereal Mass in G, and the Elgar Symphony No. 1 were on the first program; Mozart's Symphony No. 39, and Mahler's Fourth were on the second. The weather was crisp and clear both nights, but the Saturday crowd (8,014) nearly doubled that of the previous evening.

Now that Mr. Davis has become a familiar (and much admired) guest with the BSO, one must confess some puzzlement with the Tanglewood results. His recordings are stunning (particularly the current Berlioz cycle with the London Symphony on Philips), and in his Berkshire rehearsals, as previously in Boston, he established the kind of winning rapport with instrumentalists and singers which would seem to have assured memorable collaborations, particularly of the Schubert and the Mahler.

Surprisingly, last weekend at least, these expectations were never quite fulfilled to such a degree, although the performances were fine by any standard. On Friday, the Schubert Mass which had been so full of warmth and love in rehearsal, took on a frosty, distant quality. Saturday's Mozart was well-scrubbed and almost forcedly jolly, like "Figaro" in literal English translation. It remained for the Mahler Fourth, strangely enough, to melt the ice. Here Mr. Davis was at his congenial best (as with the Elgar which he had previously conducted at Symphony Hall), and from the jaunty sleighbell introduction, he was in the carefree, sunny mood that persists through the symphony.

The exquisite vocalism of soprano Judith Raskin put the shiny topping on the fourth layer of the Mahler work in its vocal account of "heavenly joys." The previous night, Miss Raskin, along with baritone Robert Hale (a singer well on his way to greater prominence), and tenor Vahan Khanzadian had warmed the atmosphere with their trio singing of the Schubert "Benedictus." The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and organist Berj Zamkochian also made their special contributions in this flood of beautiful melody.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 50,000
AUG 16 1971

Davis Conducts Mozart and Mahler To Delight of Tanglewood Audience

By LAURIE MODELL

Saturday night at Tanglewood was an evening of Mozart and Mahler, with performances of Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat and Mahler's Symphony No. 4 in G.

* * *

Colin Davis was guest conductor and he surely is one of the finest conductors to appear at Tanglewood this summer. Beginning with the Mozart, he brought out every nuance in what is one of Mozart's loveliest and most cheerful symphonies. The interpretation was invariably clean and unhurried, and despite this clarity of detail, Mr. Davis showed his primary concern to be with overall line and phrasing — to do this he would use a circular sweeping gesture through some sections while indicating the exact number of beats in others. This may seem like a small point, but it has a definite effect on the music.

The music which was conducted with a sweeping movement is smoother and more horizontal whereas the music that is conducted precisely tends to sound more accented, and the rhythm, rather than the line, is more noticeable. This subordinating of melody to rhythm and vice versa is of course common to most conductors, but the beauty of Davis' Mozart makes it seem like revelation.

Another aspect to Davis' conducting style that makes it, in particular, an interesting contrast to that of William Steinberg is his attention to the strings: they responded to this concern by frequently achieving that sought-after but seldom attained orchestral effect — that of sounding like one beautiful singing voice.

* * *

The Mahler, one of that composer's most tranquil and optimistically lyrical symphonies, certainly showed how the symphony had changed in the 120 years since Mozart. It had doubled in size, lost most of the structure of the classical symphony, and substituted in its place flights of fantasy and "philosophical" probing.

Saturday's performance began somewhat hesitantly but gradually increased in confidence and scope until it reached sweeping dimensions. The work is filled with song-like melodies, even before the entrance of the soprano soloist in the fourth movement. Davis gave his usual meticulous attention to each of these melodic fragments as though they were songs in themselves. It was as if he were preparing the listener for the melodically beautiful soprano solo sung by Judith Raskin at the end.

Miss Raskin's voice is both light and lyrical; however, it was not quite large enough to carry over many of the tutti passages in which the orchestra (possibly due to Mahler's scoring) dominated. When she sang alone, however, she displayed a pure sound that was perfectly suited to Mahler's haunting melodies.

At the close of the work (remarkably subdued for Mahler) the audience sat spellbound for a brief moment before bursting into wild applause that, even for Tanglewood's generally enthusiastic audiences was unusually prolonged.

Next week Seiji Owaza and Michael Tilson Thomas will be featured conductors.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Omnibus fare by BSO

By Ellen Pfeifer
Globe Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood over the weekend had something for just about every kind of listener; Choral works from Schubert to Xennakis; symphonies of Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Mahler and Elgar; and a Beethoven piano concerto. The conducting was shared by Colin Davis, appearing for his second set of Tanglewood concerts, and Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa.

Friday night's concert included Schubert's Mass in G, an uneven work written at age 19 and in the same year as "Erlkoenig" and "Heidenroslein," and to Elgar's masterful Symphony No. 1. The first, which featured the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and soloists Judith Raskin, Vahan Khanzadian, and Robert Hale, is difficult to bring off — even defies being brought off. At its best, the lyricism is serenely and touchingly beautiful, the textures transparent and uncomplicated; at its worst, the writing is shallow and awkward with dramatic opportunities missed and chances for development overlooked.

Very appropriately, Davis emphasized the creaminess, the childlike devotion of the work and this was as interesting and emotionally satisfying as creaminess and childlike devotion have it in their natures to be. The trio of soloists was miscast for this piece — none of them having the refined, cleanly-produced voices one wants to hear in this work.

It was, indeed, the Mozart Symphony No. 39 (Prague), rather than the long, awesomely complex Mahler Fourth, which evoked that unusual pre-intermission demonstration Saturday and this reception, I think, was an accurate barometer of the evening.

After these meticulous and thoughtful performances Davis' Mahler was a disappointment.

On Sunday afternoon, Ozawa opened the program with a recent work (1962) of Iannis Xennakis written for boy choir and symphony orchestra. Based on a text from Sophicles' "Antigone" that extols man's ability to transform nature for his purposes (ecology buffs may find this offensive), "Polla Ta Dina" is short, rather attractive in its surface details and rather shallow in content.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, suffered from the conductor and pianist's failure to decide on tempi—at least in the first two movements. In the rondo, however, there seemed to be some agreement on playing very fast.

The program closed with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetique) and, after the beautiful playing which marked most of the weekend, the orchestra proved that it could also perform brutishly and loud with lots of big slick sound and no brains.

UNION 8/16/71
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79.398

Ozawa's Skilled Conducting Enhances Varied Program

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the guidance of Seiji Ozawa presented an unusually skillful program of widely contrasting styles Sunday afternoon for 10,297 listeners at Tanglewood.

Tasteful Balance

First there was a nine-year-old invention by the experimental composer Iannis Xenakis called "Polla ta dina" (Wonders Are Many), then Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 (which was really his second) and last Tchaikovsky's monumental sixth symphony.

The symphony is so well known and loved that it almost falls into the category of old-war horse; but somehow it is too beautiful for that. The melodies are too fluid and lyrical, and the harmonic sonorities are too vibrantly effective.

Such was the case Sunday. Ozawa balanced the range of volumes tastefully, opened up the insides so that the middle of the orchestration was often available and set speeds that were appropriate.

It was a satisfying view of Tchaikovsky, strong but without exaggeration.

Pianist Nimble

A similar result occurred with the Beethoven concerto which was enhanced by a favorable combination of elements: its dual character and the capacity of the conductor, soloist (Christoph Eschenbach) and piano to adapt to that duality.

Beethoven's first two piano concertos can be mistaken easily by the unwary for one of Mozart's late concertos because they are frank imitations of the style. But Beethoven did not avoid elements of his own assertive, muscular musical character.

Eschenbach has an affinity for Mozart's dancing style, as demonstrated with great success at Tanglewood a couple of years ago, and he showed it Sunday with dancing fingers; nor did he neglect Beethoven's knottier expressions of substance.

Hard, Light

And the modern, concert grand piano, although nonexistent when the concerto was written, has the ability to put out strong, full, almost hard tones in the middle and bass for Beethoven as well as lightly ringing tones in the treble for Mozart's runs and trills.

The seven-minute "Polla ta dina," which opened the program was an exercise in harmonic contrasts which placed the Berkshire Boy Choir at the rear of the stage to sing an excerpt from Sophocles' "Antigone" on one note intermittently while the (reduced) orchestra made discordant, sliding or percussive sounds covering the whole orchestral range of pitches.

Most orchestral sounds came from the strings and they were mostly sliding and swooping, siren-like squeals, there were also some booms and crashes from the percussion section and a few soul-satisfying blasts from the brass.

Sonic contrast at least was demonstrated.

Saturday Concert

Saturday night there were 8047 listeners to hear Colin Davis conduct Mozart's 39th Symphony and Mahler's Fourth. A mile down the road, there were an estimated 6000 in a field listening to Joan Baez.

Davis' Mozart Saturday was well-scrubbed and shining, immaculate you might say, even ascetic. No flaws were apparent, except possibly a lack of human warmth.

The Mahler, on the other hand, created about an hour of pleasant well being, an escape, a state of euphoria.

Long Symphony

It is a long symphony, but it is not a great architectural structure that gradually lifts one to a climactic peak. It is more discursive, like, say, a leisurely stroll through a country town with a series of overlapping episodes and scenes of a variety of interest not necessarily directly connected.

It is a work of many pleasing short passages, ebbs and flows, tensions and releases. It is of continuous musical interest but at the same time offers ample opportunity for guiltless wool gathering.

Davis set a pace for it that seemed exactly right, leisurely and deliberately, as requested by the composer, but speedy enough to sustain interest.

On Stage

Judith Raskin, soprano, was on stage for the whole of the first three movements waiting for her assignment during the fourth.

Her smiles and slight movements in response to the music behind and around her were a pleasure to watch; they were also rare. Soloists usually sit on stage like emotionless dolls.

Her singing of the art song melodies Mahler spread through that last movement was as pleasing as her appearance. She has a clean and clear voice and it moved Saturday like quicksilver.

Attendance Friday night was 4725 and at the Saturday morning rehearsal 3243; total for the weekend was 26,297.

Next weekend the Berkshire Festival's last for 1971, will present Alexis Weissenberg, pianist, at the Friday prelude program at 7; Garrick Ohlsson, pianist, and Ozawa conductor at the 9 p.m. program Friday; Weissenberg and Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor, at the Saturday night program at 8.30; and Ozawa with the chorus and three soloists with Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" to wind up the season Sunday afternoon.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857
AUG 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Brings Back Colin Davis

Saturday night at Tanglewood Colin Davis again took the podium to conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-orchestral concert featuring music of Mozart and Mahler.

And again he proved himself to be the master of a style and approach uniquely his own.

The pleasure of encountering a new master conductor is that he invariably reveals fresh and unexpected facets in music where we thought there were no surprises left.

If one were to summarize Davis's chief gift as a conductor, it would be his wonderful sense of on-going and imperturbable rhythm. Emphases and dynamic variations occur as needed, and are intensely felt. But under all is the basic primeval rhythm, neither lagging nor speeding, filling one with a sense of rightness, rhythmic creatures that we are in a universe of rhythm.

Leonard Bernstein, himself a great Mahler interpreter, says that Mahler was a double man, and perhaps his most important duality was that of the tragic adult and the innocent child. —STOWE

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 19 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Is Review

Tanglewood, Aug. 13
By M.K.B.

The conductor for the main concert on Friday evening, Aug. 13, at Tanglewood was Colin Davis. He is a very talented conductor who exhibits complete control over the musicians and a thorough understanding of the music.

First on the program was Schubert's Mass in G, K. 167. The beauty, inspiration, and glory of this Mass is in its quietness and straightforwardness. Performing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the Tanglewood Festival Chorus; soloists Judith Raskin, soprano; Vahan Khanzadian, tenor; Robert Hale, bass; and organist Berj Zamkochian. The orchestra provided a marvelous accompaniment for the chorus and soloists whose response to Mr. Davis' inspired direction resulted in great control, ensemble, and dynamic contrast. Miss Raskin seemed to lack certainty in the control of her part, but otherwise it was a most inspired and inspiring performance.

Second and last on the program was Elgar's Symphony No. 1 in A Flat, Opus 55. The symphony is a long noble work with a magnificent ending. This was the first performance of this work at the Berkshire Festival and it was very well received. Mr. Davis was called back time and again by the audience with the enthusiastic support and applause of the symphony players themselves in recognition of his great performance and leadership.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 o'clock featured Christoph Eschenback performing Beethoven's Piano Sonata in B Flat.

Tanglewood, Aug. 14

On Saturday evening, Aug. 14, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the inspired direction of Colin Davis performed two works in an excellent program.

The first was Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E Flat K. 543. This requires just a small orchestra and is a very refreshing piece of music. It was beautifully played with a great deal of life and soul. Every note was played with clarity and inspiration, but the woodwinds were extraordinary in their ensemble and performance.

The second was Mahler's Symphony No 4 in G, which requires a full orchestra, although not as full as his other symphonies. Even though this is the shortest symphony that Mahler wrote, it is still very long, lasting a little short of one hour. But, it is very interesting with an essentially simple style, many wonderfully quiet moments which were played with much feeling and understanding, and many magnificent and powerful moments. Judith Raskin sang the soprano solo in the fourth movement and left something to be desired in this otherwise exciting performance.

So, once again Mr. Davis did a magnificent job in conducting the Boston Symphony, for it was truly a thrilling evening of great music.

Tanglewood, Aug. 15

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, Seiji Ozawa bounced to the podium to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a very interesting and exciting afternoon of music.

The program opened with the first performance in the United States of Xenakis' Polla Ta Dina (Wonders Are Many). It featured the Berkshire Boy Choir and truly was a wonder. The orchestra made sounds very much like music produced electronically, cold and lifeless. And, even though the choir sang using only one note, they gave the piece life, and soul, and warmth.

Second on the program was Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Opus 15. This early concerto of Beethoven's is Mozart-like in its clarity, crispness, and style and was beautifully performed by Christoph Eschenbach. The stomping of his feet, however, during more intense and exciting moments was very distracting and even startling at times.

Late on the afternoon's program was a very exciting performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Opus 74, the "Pathetique". Mr. Ozawa conducted this work with a great deal of inspiration, and the Boston Symphony made every note sing. The dynamic contrast and level was simply superb. The end of the fourth movement was one of the most dramatic endings I can remember and was followed by moments of silence while the audience realized the full impact of this stunning performance.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

AUG 17 1971

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Davis, Ozawa Make Music At Tanglewood

By Diane Foster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Colin Davis fared far better conducting Schubert, Elgar, and Mahler this weekend at Tanglewood than he did last weekend with Mozart.

Schubert's Mass in G was written in six days when the composer was 18 years old. Touching in its simplicity and irresistable in its straightforward expression, it is quiet, contemplative music for voices, lightly accompanied. "Though composed for a very limited orchestra," wrote Sir George Grove of the Mass in G, "and not without tokens of hurry, it is a masterpiece."

Its performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening with Judith Raskin, soprano, Vahan Khanzadian, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass, confirmed Sir George's judgment. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, produced the gentle, hushed, and reverent tone upon which this type of religious work is a parasite. Neither chorus, orchestra, nor soloists were restricted or strained by balance problems, thus permitting detail and shape to be naturally in the foreground. With sensitive and beautiful performances by all three groups, the mass, staged in the shed, provoked the awe, warmth, and holiness of a church service.

Believing

The second half of the concert introduced fire, color, and passion into the virginal church scene. As in Tchaikovsky, half of the battle with Elgar's symphony No. 1 in A flat, Op. 55 is won by virtue of believing in it. Mr. Davis, or course, was on sacred home ground with this very English work.

Though at times he could have emphasized the musical construction with more subtle dynamics or a strategically placed retard, he seduced both audience and orchestra members with Elgar's elegance, spirit, and power. The brasses were particularly persuasive in the stirring climax of the finale.

On Saturday night Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543 received a good, well-thought-out performance. What seemed to be missing, however, was the feeling of fresh delight in the reading of it. The woodwinds, for instance, which are of major melodic importance in Mozart, were monochromatically forte despite the conductor's efforts to hush them; dynamic and textural contrasts on the whole left room for further development.

This symphony, the first of Mozart's great last three, is lovely music of direct, honest charm. But, in this listener's mind at least, it was somewhat eclipsed by the expectation of the transcendental Mahler that was to follow.

Mahler called each of his symphonies a "world" and attempted to merge sophistication with simplicity and lofty, wide-range conceptions and struggles with lyricism. The Fourth is one of the more popular of his variegated "worlds" because it is comparatively easily accessible. It is the shortest of the nine symphonies: unified in musical form, lightly orchestrated, and essentially simple in content and style. Moreover, Mahler's usual dark and morbid thoughts are transformed here by a dream of a serene, sublime, even gay heaven.

Transported

The superb performance of the symphony did indeed depict ethereal fulfillment. Fragments of tempi, rhythms, and instrumental colors and textures comprised a promenade of aural continuity under the direction of Mr. Davis. The emotional content was visually realized by the effervescent Judith Raskin, whose face radiated her spiritual transportation by the music.

Miss Raskin's contribution as soprano soloist in the last movement was equally aurally radiant. Delighting in the joys of heaven and abandoning herself to "dancing and leaping, skipping and singing," she personified the dichotomous spirit of an angelic human.

Her performance was obviously the highlight of the symphony as well as of the evening from the audience's point of view, for she was recalled on stage several times. Colin Davis remained in her shadow during the applause, his diffident English politiesse preventing him from acknowledging well deserved thanks for an overwhelming portrayal of the entire scope of the Mahler.

Seiji Ozawa stepped on the podium on Sunday afternoon to conduct the first performance in the United Stats of Polla Ta Dina by Iannis Xenakis. It is a short, stylized work in which a children's choir sings a text from Sophocles' Antigone on a single note while surrounded by orchestral sounds characterized by glissandi, sharp punctuations, and imitative electronic music.

On first hearing Polla Ta Dina offered no profound or exciting revelations, merely interesting sound combinations — which became less interesting after a short while. Because the text is in Greek, is it impossible to decipher any musical-textual alliance without a literal translation. The Berkshire Boys Choir directed by Allan Wicks seemed hesitant and dynamically weak.

Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 in C evinced a battle between conductor and soloist with regard to tempi. The first and last movements were taken at such a clip that many of the details were obliterated in the process. The details that were allowed to surface in Cristoph Eschenbach's fine piano playing, however, made one strain to catch more.

Quick Glimpse

Mr. Eschenbach apparently had in mind for the second movement, largo, a faster tempo which would have alleviated the impression that it went on forever. Nevertheless, the movement was beautifully expressive. The whole performance, in fact, caught the spirit of Beethoven born out of Mozart, and in the first movement cadenza, provided a glimpse of the fully developed composer.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, the Pathetique, ended the concert and the weekend on a rather depressing note, musically as well as spiritually. With lucid detail and good solo and ensemble playing, the first movement promised an exciting performance, yet simultaneously hinted at a sloppy one. The second movement courted the suggestion by realizing piano as forte, ignoring the "sweet and plaintive" expressive indication and disguising the shape of construction. Unfortunately, things got progressively worse until the symphony became an exercise in reading fast and loud.

Next weekend at Tanglewood marks the end of the 1971 season. The grand finale will be on Sunday afternoon with Seiji Ozawa conducting the rarely-performed Damnation of Faust by Berlioz.

COLIN DAVIS

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

AUG 15 1971

New England Newsclip

Elgar's Symphony At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A program of moderate interest attracted an audience of 4,725 to Tanglewood Friday night for the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh and next to last weekend.

Among those who did come, some apparently became disenchanted because there was a considerable exodus before the end of Elgar's First Symphony.

The trouble certainly wasn't with conductor Colin Davis.

Last weekend in his Tanglewood debut, Davis of BBC in London, identified himself as a batonist of unqualified efficiency and lucid musical perception.

Total Obeisance

Again on Friday night the orchestra responded in kind. We've rarely heard the strings produce a more lavish and luxuriant tone and there was evidence from all sections of total obeisance to direction.

First part of the program was Schubert's Mass in G Major. Soloists were Judith Raskin, soprano; Vahan Khanzadian, tenor; and Robert Hale bass.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus of 75 mixed voices had been thoroughly prepared by John Oliver. Organist supplementing the orchestra was Berg Zamkochian.

Schubert's disarmingly beautiful Mass glows most brightly in a smaller setting. Its intimate communication is lost in a vast arena. The music shed acoustics are remarkably clear but the soulful appearance and simplicity of Schubert's Mass requires close proximity.

PROGRAM

Mass in G Major	Schubert
Judith Raskin soprano
Vahan Khanzadian tenor
Robert Hale bass
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Berj Zamkochian organist
Symphony No. 1 in A flat, Opus 55	Elgar

A modulated warm tonal quality made a poignant petition of the Kyrie. The gloria wasn't always solidly on pitch, but Davis brought out its jubilant quality with an alert "E" tempo.

The credo was sung without much fluctuation of tempo or dynamics. A spirit of fervor still prevailed. The fugue of the sanctus was clear in design, slightly mechanical and tonally sparkling.

Singers Stand Out

Miss Raskin displayed a fresh clear soprano voice and compelling feeling for the text. Tenor Khanzadian bought vocal attractiveness and textural affinity to his brief solo passages.

In the gloria, Hale sang well enough but without much depth. His effectiveness was much more telling in the agnus dei.

This was the first performance of the Elgar Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival. It is likely to resume its former silence.

It is neither a good nor bad piece of music. Davis and the orchestra gave it ultimate advantages. In fact, Davis was so intent and enveloped in the works that some of its pseudo pomp and rhapsodic palpitations were deceivingly impressive.

Davis made a pronounced feature of its melody. By and large, all four movements are drenched in a kind of Victorian passion.

Davis' obvious belief in the work is to be questioned. Unfortunately the symphony's intrinsic value isn't enhanced by superior performance. Results were sometimes shiny, but the work itself is surfaceful.

90

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 16 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Weekend Collage of Sounds

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SEVENTH weekend at Tanglewood was identified by three programs of exceptional interest.

* * *

SEIJI OZAWA started his program yesterday with Xenakis' "Polla ta dina" (Wonders are many), a work for boys choir and orchestra. Xenakis, of a Greek family, writes what he himself calls stochastic music — music of indeterminism, conjectural, aiming at a target. When he was here several years ago on the staff of the Berkshire Music Center, he elucidated his compositions by means of a blackboard chart most articulately, but it looked something like the diagrams Knute Rockne made for his Notre Dame backfield.

Xenakis is also an architect and worked with Le Corbusier on the Philips Pavilion at the Brussels World's Fair in 1958. Edgard Varese also provided music for the Fair, which was broadcast over the whole grounds. It is paradoxical that a man capably trained in so exacting a vocation as architecture should be so little attached to rules and conformity in his second and equally competent vocation.

Yesterday, the Berkshire Boy Choir, Allan Wicks, music director, assisted, and their chore was to sing on one note verses from Sophocles's Antigone, against which the orchestra plays a collage of sounds.

This sort of music requires a new standard of appreciation. Sophocles's lines in translation were sung in English. Their message, read in the program notes, are of transcendent inspiration, but are neither comprehensible as chanted viva voce by the youths' adorable tessitura nor conveyed to this listener by the monotonous undeviating projection. The musicians are left to roam at will in the musical pasture feeding on goodies of their own acceptance of succulence. And the conductor struggles with the wind, the elements, that is, not a section of the orchestra. This was very worthwhile to expose the efforts of a man highly regarded within the fraternity and to allow the audience to break out of their fences within which Strauss waltzes and Chopin nocturnes are the customary pablum.

* * *

OZAWA GAVE a vital reading of the Tchaikovsky sixth symphony, the "Pathetique." Let him be awarded kudos immediately for allowing no interval to elapse between the end of the third movement and the final lament. I wish that he, and all other conductors, would do the same thing after the first movement as they proceed into the unsymmetrical allegro con grazia. This cries out for immediate linking with the coda of the preceding movement. The conductor can easily prevent the inevitable interruption of applause at this point by the dexterous raising of his arms.

The Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Opus 13, brought back Christoph Eschenbach in a sensational performance. The slow movement was played with extraordinarily beautiful tone, and sparks flew in the surrounding sections. Rarely has such phenomenal command of the keyboard been dominated by such taste and restraint. Eschenbach didn't play a note without the apparent application of forethought and superb judgment, and yet he played with defiance and masterful nonchalance.

Whitestone

Ozawa conducts as soloist Christoph Eschenbach exhibits "phenomenal command" in Beethoven's concerto.

* * *

HISTORY and men's lives do not conform to easy slots. The lives of Elgar (Friday night) and Mahler (Saturday) straddled the turn of the century. Elgar's first and Mahler's fourth symphonies were written in the very early years of this century, but both are of the 19th century in every respect. Indeed, the 19th-century music-wise ended in 1914.

Colin Davis made the Mahler symphony one of the most lofty events of the season. He started out truly deliberately (debachtig), a pace too often disregarded, and he remained in a leisurely mood through the following movement as well. In the adagio, he rose to grandiloquent heights. Mahler uses huge instrumental forces, yet in proper hands the progress of the simple songs can remain transparent. Davis obviously was playing with deep affection, and the orchestra was responding with its most sympathetic amplitude.

* * *

AFTER such sublime anguish, what could follow? Mahler was too sensitive a poet to introduce anything in contrasting boisterousness. How does he solve the situation? He introduces a voice, in this case lovely Judith Raskin, singing with compassionate involvement and using her beautiful voice with complete ease and penetrating insight into the ultimate human secrets.

Although it was superfluous in Davis's case, Mahler instructs the conductor that it is "absolutely indispensable that the singer be discreetly accompanied." Miss Raskin had no trouble in carrying her voice to the audience, even in its most dolce and styleful passages of the verses from "The Youth's Magic Horn."

This final movement is interspersed with repetition of the symphony's introductory bird calls played by the flutes. Otherwise, the strings are instructed to use mutes, and even the braggart percussion is asked to use discretion and employ baguettes of sponge. The great work comes to an end in awesome quiet.

In the second movement, Joseph Silverstein earned tribute for his fluent performance of the solo, which falls to the lot of the concertmaster. Mahler ordains that the violin, in this case, be tuned scordatura, a tone higher than usual, so that the solo may be played to take advantage of the sonority thus derived, as well as to facilitate the execution.

Davis approached his Mozart Symphony No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543, with the same moderation. The tempos were ideally at ease. In the charming andante, he made the same spaced pause at the top of the ascending third-bar phrase, which has not been observed in any of the nine repetitions of this symphony since Koussevitzky last played it here in 1949.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT, Davis divided his program into two parts, of which the first Elgar symphony was much more time-consuming, but which, for magnetic grip, had to contend with the lovely Mass in G of Schubert, written when he was an 18-year-old — should one say man or boy? The Mass had the contribution of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, and of three soloists, Miss Raskin, soprano, Vahan Khanzadian, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass.

After the Mozart Requiem and the Beethoven Missa Solemnis, Schubert is a shy, plaintive maiden. He does assert himself at moments, but essentially it is the Schubert of tender and gentle speech we know and love so well that appears in his first Mass. Davis made sure to keep it in character. The orchestra was reduced to proper dimensions and the effect was of graceful faith rather than of thunderous demands.

The Elgar symphony was something else. A huge orchestra is used, and no section or instrumental choir is allowed respite during its hour-long duration, which only a watch could vouch for. It sped past, or simply held the audience tightly gripped. On closer inspection, it isn't really all that good. It is repetitious and fustian, but it is also deeply noble, excitingly exuberant, vividly romantic. Indeed so full of ideas and material, he could have written another symphony or two with the results of careful pruning.

Davis spurred the orchestra with passion to their best efforts and most glorious sonorities. On the other hand, he was less than exacting for discipline and intonation in the opening introduction and, in his own complete immersion, failed to maintain balance consistently.

The conductor extracted the last ounce of nobility from the heartbreaking adagio, but in the more agitated movements, notably his first and fourth, he whipped up so much powerful and ebullient ferment that he arrived at an inspissated turbidity, bordering on opacity. Some of Elgar's ideas deserved clearer exposition. A detail of the composer's sense of the dramatic was to be observed with his final exit. After a wonderful turmoil of collaboration between the musicians and the podium, Elgar cools off, receding cumulatively into a poignant farewell sounded by a single, soft clarinet on a sustained note most beautifully sounded by the orchestra's solo clarinet Harold Wright.

Short but Beautiful

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The first section of the concert at Tanglewood Friday wasn't long (26 minutes), but it was incredibly beautiful.

Colin Davis led about half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus (80 voices) plus three soloists through Schubert's Mass in G.

It is music of wonderfully gentle melody, graceful, supple and liquid, a balanced mixture of short solo interludes and expressive choruses.

There are no big, shouting choral numbers of overpowering volume, the kind that shake the bones. It is not that kind of piece; drama and excitement are not part of its message, but there is an endless string of lyrical moments, of comforting, pacifying sounds.

The soloists are mostly apparent for their punctuating phrases between choruses, but they have an opportunity at the beginning of the Benedictus to display a beautiful trio of woven melodies. It is one of the high points.

The soloists were Judith Raskin, a soprano with a light, silvery tone; and Vahan Khanzadian, tenor, and Robert Hale, bass, both of whom sang with warm, rounded, soft-edged tones of substance.

After intermission, the program offered Elgar's 50-minute Symphony Audience, 4725.

Elgar, who is best known for "Pomp and Circumstance," is not the most popular of composers, although he has his fervent followers.

The long first symphony, certainly cannot offend anyone. It has charm (here and there) and taste and breeding and dignity. It is an English symphony and was conducted by an English Musician.

It provided many moments of satisfaction for its fans; otherwise it was not inspiring.

Christoph Eschenbach who is scheduled to play the piano Sunday afternoon with the orchestra in Beethovens First Piano Concerto appeared at 7 for the weekend prelude program.

He played Beethovens "Hammerklavier" sonata which is about as different from that composers first piano concerto as Mount Everest is from a pile of Marie Antoinettes wigs.

The "Hammerklavier" is a gigantic work for one player. The first concerto is a playful game for say 65.

No one ventures into the and no one emerges un- "Hammerklavier" blithely and no one emerges unscathed. Eschenbach is no blithe player. He is intensely serious and sensitive a first - class player of Mozart for instance.

His big sonata Friday was received with mixed feelings. He put forth some beautiful music in the deeply felt romantic sense . . . but Beethoven's sonatas for the most part are not deeply felt romantic style and the "Hammerklavier" especially is not romantic in intent.

A hint of what happened is in the knowledge that the recording of this work by Schnabel, one of history's Beethoven experts, runs 40 minutes and 45 seconds; Eschenbach's performance Friday was informally timed at a bit more than 50 minutes (including about five seconds delay in the middle of the big fugue near the end when he stopped, threw up a hand and complained out loud about a faulty key, namely the e above middle c).

Most of the extra 10 minutes came during the last part of the third (adagio) movement and the first part of the fourth (largo). They were very slow.

Also a good part of the added time probably came during the overemphasized pauses between phrases, and the surprising frequency of hesitations and note - stretching (rubato).

Eschenbach played the piece with more exaggeration than is usually expected from Beethoven, and it is likely that even though some of it (i.e. early in the adagio) sounded beautiful, Beethoven experts in the audience were frowning.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 14 1971

New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,698

AUG 16 1971

Tanglewood Music a Delight

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — About the most enjoyable problem a reviewer can have is the worry that he may run out of superlatives and begin repeating himself. This weekend at Tanglewood provided the occasion for just such a dilemma.

Mozart and Mahler are sometimes programmed together for the sake of contrast, but the concert which Colin Davis led of works by these composers revealed more similarities than differences. Many commentators, Mr. Davis among them, have written of the aura of lost innocence which pervades so much of Mozart's music. Mahler's "Symphony No. 4" is the most classically scored and tightly developed of the composer's works in the form, and the ambivalence of mood sometimes recalls Mozart.

THE MOZART composition on the program was the "Symphony No. 39". The performance was extraordinary. As with the all-Mozart concert which Mr. Davis led last week, it was not a matter of observing a conductor and weighing how this or that passage was taken. One listened to and marveled at the music. This listener has never encountered a finer Mozart conductor than Mr. Davis.

Although it would be difficult to imagine a Davis performance, of, for example, the Mahler "Sixth", the "Fourth" appeared to play to his sympathies and his realization was a splendid one. Judith Raskin was a near-perfect soloist in the final movement. It was also a great night for the Boston Symphony. The playing in the Mahler was perfection itself.

Sunday afternoons program was conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The concert opened with the American premiere of Xenakis' "Polla ta dina". The composer's background in mathematics and his compositional theories led one to expect a work which would appeal solely to the specialist, but "Polla" proved to be fascinating and eocative. The Berkshire Boy Choir, Allan Wicks, director, assisted in the performance.

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH was soloist in Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 1". Mr. Eschenbach is an exemplary technician, but what distinguished the performance for this listener was his lightly inflected, poetic approach to the score. Mr. Ozawa was a true collaborator, matching the soloist's conception and drawing some very refined playing from the orchestra.

The concert concluded with Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6", the "Pathetique". Mr. Ozawa is an excellent Tchaikovsky conductor, avoiding both mannerism, on one hand, and a sense of embarassment with the music, on the other. This listener particularly admired Mr. Ozawa's technical control in the third movement, which he took as a scherzo rather than a march. He secured exceedingly clear articulation and never permitted the music to descend into bombast.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 18 1971

New England Newsclip

91

Concert Review

BSO At Berkshire Festival

By Martha deB Beaver

Gloriously clear weather prevailed for the next-to-last weekend of the Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Colin Davis conducted the Schubert Mass in G Friday evening with soloists Judith Raskin, soprano, tenor Vahan Khanzadian, bass Robert Hale, and organist Berj Zamkochian, in a stirring performance. The only other work was Elgar's first symphony, debatably impressive and unusually emotional in conception and development for an English composer, in its first performance at the festival.

Saturday evening Mr. Davis again directed the Boston Symphony players in a beautifully ordered but passionately pure reading of Mozart's E-flat Symphony No. 39, K.543. Every aspect of the musical structure was illuminated with classic clarity, that marvelously dissonant clash of D-flat and C, those diminished sevenths and augmented fourths in canon form just before the Allegro section of the first movement, so audacious to 18th century audiences and still deliciously daring to 20th century Mozart devotees.

Concentration

To the Andante Mr. Davis brought an adagio concentration, rhythmically exact and punctilious, very contained and refined, even the fortes. The gentle and stately was similarly Minuet straightforward, the Haydn-like Finale, especially in its sprightly theme and development, but very Mozartean and unpredictable modulations, without exploratory depth. We do think that Mr. Davis' interpretations are models of classic beauty, but like the Greek statues and their Roman copies, devoid of that quality which imparts the suggestion of life to Michaelangelo matchless forms. Certainly Mozart expresses a wealth of emotions in all of his works, his music demanding interpretation far beyond that which 18th century musicians and artists were capable of producing.

Whatever Mr. Davis' artistic aims, his conception of Mozart's style was an understandable and tasteful contrast to the kaleidoscopic confusion of the sublime and ridiculous, though creative and technically imaginative, Mahler brings to his fourth symphony in G major. It was an adventure in the composer's substantial enrichment of the musical idiom through orchestral expression, alternately appealing and appalling, the solo violin tuned up a half-tone insisting on C minor in a rather aggressive, ordinary tune during the second movement, which ended on gentle glissandi motives in the bass against muted brass... the soaring sweet fantasies of the third movement's very free variations, with delicate harp and bass pizzicati, and an exquisitely formed oboe melody, pensively projected over a diminishing version in the bass, all alternating between major and minor, moods changing from exalted to playful.

The Finale, a setting for soprano solo and orchestra for the fairy folklore text "In Heaven hang many fiddles", is brief and a complete delight. Judith Raskin, Smith College Alumna, brought to the naive verses the rapturous joy of a small child, effortlessly achieving both dramatic and musical challenges with a purity of vocal sound that encompassed all registers.

Enjoyment

There was no doubt about Miss Rankin's enjoyment of Mahler's music as she exhibited her pleasure to the audience during the first three movements. Nonetheless it was distracting and even a little disturbing, since one's attention was often unintentionally and irresistibly drawn to the lovely young singer.

It does seem, however, that comment on the music should be confined to conductor and those in the act of performing.

Sunday's concert was musically gratifying in every respect. It started with the premier performance in the United States of Romanian-born Green composer, Iannis Xenakis' Polla ta dina (Wonders are many), with words sung on one note by the Amherst College-resident Berkshire Boys Choir (trained by Allan Wicks), taken from one of the choruses of Sophocles' Antigone. The monotone rhythmic utterance was most impressive against a highly captivating conglomeration of orchestral sounds Xenakis devised to suggest electronic music. Unlike many contemporary composers, Xenakis stated his ideas briefly and without prolonged embellishment.

Highlight for this reviewer, although we must admit Ozawa made the closing Tschaikowsky Pathetique refreshingly revelatory, was the amazingly introspective and empathic (evident a year ago) performance of Christoph Eschenbach in Beethoven's first piano concerto in C major, (actually second in order of composition). He embraced the derivative and idealized (by the composer) styles of Mozart and Haydn, and the embryonic profundity of Beethoven with an absorbed assurance and devout reflection, gentle, graceful, sprightly, the cadenzas unmistakably Beethoven evenly balanced between right and left hand. And he does play the right brand of instrument.

Pianist

The last weekend of the Berkshire Festival presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg in the Friday weekend prelude at 7, with Ozawa conducting BSO at 9:00 in Prokofiev's second piano concerto with Garrick Ohlsson and three Romeo and Juliet-based works by Prokofiev, Berlioz and Tchaikowsky. Saturday Michael Tilson Thomas will direct Mozart's Paris Symphony, Ravel's piano concerto in G with Alexis Weissenberg and Nielson's fifth symphony. The concluding concert features Berlioz' Damnation of Faust, with soloists Lois Marshall, John Alexander, Ezio flagello, under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 50,027 SUN. 52,421

AUG 22 1971

Tanglewood Performances Are Well Worth the Effort

Practically every seat in the house was taken. Outside, on the lawn, the rest of the audience spread blankets and opened picnic baskets, as is the custom.

The next to the last Tanglewood Weekend of the 1971 season was under way, and almost every public place — from shops and restaurants to motels — seemed to be catering to small groups of people discussing concert programs.

Many concertgoers accept a 200-or 300-mile drive as a matter of routine when it comes to the summer concert season. The fact is that the summer season is poor in most areas.

The Tanglewood season has many advantages, the most obvious and perhaps the most important being the fact that it fills a desperate need for serious music during two months of the year.

But the Tanglewood series goes far beyond merely filling the gap. The programs are carefully selected, challenging for performers and audience, and frequently offer new or rarely performed works.

Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, William Steinberg, music dircetor. The performance shed as well as the Tanglewood School are located in Lenox.

Guest Conductors

The season generally features a number of guest conductors. Last weekend, for example, two concerts were conducted by Colin Davis and one by Seiji Ozawa.

The formula is always the same: A brief Friday concert entitled the "Weekend Prelude," which begins at 7, followed by the symphony concert at 9.

There is a Saturday morning open rehearsal, and an evening concert; and a final concert on Sunday afternoon.

Last weekend deserves special mention for its combination of fine programming, powerful conducting, and excellent soloists. The Sunday afternoon concert was one of the most overwhelming I have heard.

Ozawa conducted the BSO in the American premiere of the Xenakis' "Polla ta dina," Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15," and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74."

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who opened the weekend on Friday with the Beethoven "Sonata, Op. 106," performed the concerto at the Sunday concert.

He is an incredibly sensitive and intense musician, supremely capable of conveying the broad shape and direction of a work as well a the most minute detail.

What was really significant, however, about the Beethoven concerto was not Eschenbach's performance, but the way in which Eschenbach and Ozawa were able to interact.

The concept of the division of a concerto into the elements of orchestra and soloists has led to a great many distortions of the composer's intention.

With Eschenbach and Ozawa, the Beethoven was a chamber work. There was one interpretation — 'Theirs' — and there were no unresolved musical differences.

Great Enthusiasm

Ozawa is able to make musicians respond to his ideas with great enthusiasm. It is fascinating to watch him conduct, as he does so with his entire body.

There are few conventional gestures, yet he is communicating what he feels about every note and every phase.

Both Eschenbach and Ozawa seem to place great importance on analyzing harmonic details in great depth. Rather than providing one with a vague sense of the harmonic tendency, one is given a knowledge of all the possibilities of each situation. But the chosen solution is always given strong justification.

Some of the most familiar musical jokes have been based on the temptation to over-romanticize the works of Tchaikovsky. The ample opportunity for sentimentality and dramatics afford a conductor an easy means of rousing an audience.

This did provide something of a problem during the "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor." Ozawa became visibly distressed at an outburst of applause at the end of the third movement, which ends with a tremendously exiciting finale. The applause at this point completely shattered the effect of the tragic and moving fourth movement, and the conductor was for several tense moments regaining his composure.

That was an unfortunate example of an effect which is difficult to avoid, particularly with a good performance. An exciting "finale" nearly always elicits the kind of outburst from an audience which annoys a conductor striving to communicate something much deeper than a fixed climactic section can provide.

Counterpoint

By Rena Fruchter

Depth, Dignity

Throughout the rest of the symphony, however, Ozawa established that kind of depth and dignity which one rarely experience in performances of Tchaikovsky.

The "Polla ta dina", written in 1962, is for orchestra and children's choic, chanting on one note one of the choruses of Sophocles' "Antigone." The instrumenalt writing involves the superimposition of many types of unusual instrumental sounds.

A word of advice for potential 1972 Tanglewood visitors: Book tickets and accommodations at least a month in advance. The Tanglewood concerts are well worth all the effort.

92

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 21 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Preludes--Best Things Are Indeed Free

By RICHARD CONVEY

Some of the best things are free.

Well, maybe not exactly free; but, on the other hand, neither do they cost anything.

What I am talking about are the Weekend Prelude programs at Tanglewood. Anyone buying a ticket for the regular Friday evening concert is entitled to also attend the prelude program which starts two hours before the main performance.

So, while it isn't exactly free, the Friday night concert - goer can get two for the price of one. And why more people aren't taking advantage of it is beyond me. In this critic's opinion, some of the most outstanding performances are taking place in these Weekend Preludes.

The music is of the chamber type — piano and vocal solos, small instrumental ensembles, etc. Much of it, therefore, is intimate in nature, and somewhat out of place in the huge Music Shed. But it works.

* * *

Last night, for example, Alexis Weissenberg drew a prolonged ovation from the somewhat rain - drenched crowd that did bother to come early.

He played the Franck - Bauer "Prelude, fugue et variation, op. 18," and the Schumann "Etudes symphoniques, op. 13." In a controlled, clear and precise manner, with his hands kept close to the keyboard, Weissenberg executed the technical demands of the Schumann "Etudes," never losing sight of the music in them and always sensitive to the dynamic and rhythmic characteristics of each piece.

One could not help but contract Weissenberg's recital with that of Earl Wild a few weeks ago. Wild's choice of music was the more flamboyant style of Franz Liszt. It left the listener gasping.

This really bring up another point about these Weekend Preludes. One can get a chance to hear music that he ordinarily would not get a chance to hear. And performed by artists the calibre of which he would not ordinarily get a chance to hear. (This is especially true of us in the Springfield area, where such opportunities are limited, to say the least.)

It is not very likely that we would get to hear a complete performance of the Schumann "Etudes," for example. Or the Joseph Marx songs sung by Metropolitan baritone Sherrill Milnes this summer.

* * *

These call for a highly skilled singer, and an equally skilled accompanist. It was a pleasure to hear the unfamiliar works, and we point them out as further examples of what can be heard at the Tanglewood preludes.

Finally, there was the opening Weekend Prelude, which featured the first chair string players of the Boston Symphony.

There was a simply exquisite performance by cellist Jules Eskin. And we recall Burton Fine playing the old - fashioned viola d'amore, with its delicate, sweet sound.

As we said, for this critic, some of the Weekend Prelude programs were really superior to the regular Boston Symphony concerts. And all one had to do to hear them was show up early.

8th WEEKEND

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,202

AUG 12 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Artist Director Seiji Ozawa conducts Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" in the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival on Sunday, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood shed. Lois Marshall, soprano sings the rose of Marguerite and tenor John Alexander is Faust. Mephistopheles is sung by bass-baritone Ezio Fiagello. The Tanglewood Festival Choir will be directed by John Oliver.

Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. Ozawa will conduct two pieces by Prokofiev, "The Suite from Romeo and Juliet" and Piano Concerto No. 2 with Garrick Ohlsson debuting with the BSO.

Berlioz' love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikowsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo Juliet" are also on the program.

Mozart's "Paris Symphony" No. 31 and Ravel's Piano Concerto in G will head the program Saturday, Aug. 21, at 8:30 p.m. Alexis Weissenberg will be soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas will also conduct Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

* * *

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 5,560

AUG 12 1971

Musically, We're Up To Our Ears, Eyes

By LOUISA KREISBERG
WRN Staff Writer

We're right up to our ears in music. Literally.

The mailbag bulges with news of concerts from the Tappan Zee to Tanglewood. Westchester's own Garrick Ohlsson, the 22-year-old White Plains pianist who walked off with first prize in last year's Chopin International piano competition in Warsaw, will be guest soloist twice in the same week with two of the nation's top orchestras.

Ohlsson will perform the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 with the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Stanislaw Skrowaczewski at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center on Aug. 13.

On Aug. 20, the young artist will be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. in the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 2. The orchestra will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

THE TAPPAN Zee Chamber Music concert series features Masako Yanagita, violin, Eric Simon, clarinet, and Abba Bogin, piano, this Sunday at 3 p.m. at the Tappan Zee Playhouse in Nyack.

The opera season is upon us. The New York City Opera Company opens 11 weeks of repertory Sept. 2 at the New York State Theater at Lincoln Center.

Among the new productions are Benjamin Britten's "Albert Herring," Bizet's "Carmen" and Floyd's "Susannah".

Also in the repertory are the company's fine productions of Boito's "Mefistofele," Donizett's "Roberto Devereux" and Janacek's "The Makropoulos Affair," among others.

A "Mostly Mozart Bike-In" has been announced by a group of cyclists who call themselves "Bike for a Better City."

The group will meet at the reflecting pool at Lincoln Center at 7:30 p.m. Aug. 24 where each cyclist will receive a ticket entitling him to a parking spot for his bike (bring your own chain and lock) and an orchestra seat to Lincoln Center's "Mostly Mozart Festival" featuring Alexander Schneider and his chamber ensemble.

Not a bad idea for Westchester either. Why not a "Music for Westchester Bike-In" this autumn, or a "Philharmonic Symphony of Westchester Bike-In" or a "Westchester Symphony Bike-In"? Most of us could use the exercise, and the orchestras could use the customers.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

AUG 13 1971

Concerts, arts, crafts beckon in three surrounding states

Eighth and final weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tenglewood will be highlighted by a complete concert performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

NEXT WEEKEND also offers the two-day arts and crafts fair at the Garrison Art Center on the banks of the Hudson.

And the Polis Festival and Country Fair in Doylestown, Pa., is expected to attract more than 100,000 visitors over the Labor Day weekend.

At Tanglewood, Garrick Ohlsson, pianist, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening at Tanglewood. He is the first American prize winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw. Another pianist, Alexis Weissenberg will be featured at the weekend prelude next Friday evening in the Shed.

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, conducts the final Boston Symphony open rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 21, and the final concert of the season Sunday afternoon when Lois Marshall, soprano sings the role of Marquerite; John Alexander, Faust; Ezio Flagello, Mephistopheles, with the Tanglewood Festival Choir as the chorus.

MORE THAN 100 artists and craftsmen will be on hand from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. next Saturday and Sunday, Aug. 21 and 22, at Garrison, N.Y., where the lists of things to view or buy includes oils, watercolors, sculpture, pen and ink sketches, photographs, hand-woven and hand-painted fabrics, hand-blown glass, leather specialties, candles, and many others.

During the afternoons, Garrison's theater group, "The Hand-To-Mouth Players, will present entertainment and Saturday evening a folk-song concert.

CULTURAL HIGHLIGHT of the Polish Festival and Country Fair on the grounds of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Czestochowa promises to be the Adam Styka Memorial Art Exhibit and Sale of the works of American artists of Polish origin and descent.

The Exhibit and sale will be housed in the exhibit hall at the National Shrine and will be open free of charge to the general public throughout the three days of the Festival — Saturday, Sunday and Monday Sept. 4, 5 and 6.

It is being sponsored by the American Council of Polish Cultural Clubs in association with the cultural division of the National Shrine of Our Lady of Czestochowa headed by the Very Reverend Michael M. Zembrzuski, O.S.P.

More than 90 pieces submitted by the affiliated member groups of the American Council of Polish Cultural Clubs, will be displayed professionally. A number of the works of the late great Polish-born now the property of the National Shrine will be on view. American artist, Adam Styka,

An added incentive for the American artists of Polish descent will be the awards of $500, $200 and $100. A special peoples' choice award of $100 will be made for the painting that receives the most votes of viewers.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,3

APR 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Pianist who caused sensation here to be Tanglewood soloist

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

On the evening of April 9, 1965, a 16-year-old pianist created something of a furore at Chandler Street Junior High in a Fairlawn Hospital benefit concert.

It was a joint concert by the Swedish guitarist, Per-Olof Johnson, and pianist Garrick Ohlsson.

The Telegram review stated that "although Olsson's intended role was that of assisting artist, he contributed a sensational performance of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Opus 57, "Appassionata." He also played Mendelssohn's Prelude in F sharp minor as an encore.

No Surprise

In January, 1967, Harry Levenson presented Ohlsson as soloist with the Worcester Orchestra in a Family Concert at the Auditorium. Ohlsson played Beethoven's First Piano Concerto.

Another sensation.

It doesn't come as a surprise that Ohlsson is among eight distinguished pianists who will be soloists with the Boston Symphony in the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood this summer.

He has since won the Queen Elizabeth Award in Belgium and has had conspicuous success in several top-flight concert engagements.

Tanglewood's Season

A few weeks ago, he fooled the panel on the television program, "To Tell the Truth," and proved his identity by playing Chopin's bristling Etude in A minor, Opus 10, No. 2 — a finicky little work that most pianists avoid like the plague.

Ohlsson will play at Tanglewood, Friday night, August 20, with the Boston Symphony, conducted by Bruno Maderna. He will be heard in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. Balance of the program is Mozart's 29th Symphony, and the American premiere of Maderna's "Grande Aulodia."

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Tanglewood's eight-week season begins Friday, July 2 and ends Sunday, Aug. 22.

Remaining pianists are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Stephen Bishop, Christoph Eschenbach, Byron Janis, Ruth Laredo, Alexis Weissenberg and Earl Wild.

Conductors, William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Thomas, Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein (Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, July 25), Colin Davis, Leon Fleisher, Eugene Ormandy and Arthur Fiedler.

As in the past several summers, concerts will be Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8:30 p.m., and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. A Friday night weekend prelude will be performed at 7 p.m. Regular ticket holders attend the "Prelude" at additional cost, and seats in the music shed are not reserved.

Anna Maria College Choir

The quality of choral direction provided at Anna Maria College by Malama Providakes Robbins can be judged in the college's Foundress Hall, Sunday, April 25.

Mrs. Robbins will conduct her Chamber Choir in Morales' "Missus Est Gabriel," Weelkes' "The Nightingale," Toch's "Geographical Fugue" and Hermann's arrangement of "Ye Saints and Servants."

Under Mrs. Robbins' direction, Anna Maria College Glee Club won first place, March 21, in the Ninth Annual Intercollegiate Women's Glee Club Festival Competition at Annhurst College, Woodstock, Conn.

Other participating choral groups were from Molloy, Mt. St. Mary's, Georgian Court, St. Peter's, Ladycliff, Villanova and Annhurst.

Guest Soloist

Guest soloist at the April 25 concert will be Worcester soprano Mary Ann Knight in "Pace, Pace" from Verdi's "Il Trovatore."

A number of students also will participate: Pianists Sandra Geronda, Susan Martel, Josephine Nigro, Lois Mason, Denise Cote, Vivian Beauregard, Laura Caravella and Maureen Britt. Student singers are Mary Therese Murray, Rachel Archambault, Marie Tassinari, Margaret Tartaglia, and Annette Charpentier.

Weelkes' "Nightingale' 'was the required number for all clubs at the Annhurst competition. Chosen by lottery, Anna Maria was the first to appear. Each group was allocated ten minutes for performance.

The 10th annual competition will be March 12 and 13, 1972, hopefully at Anna Maria College. The competition work is "Suscepit Israel" from Bach's "Magnificat."

Attendance at the April 25th concert at Anna Maria will be by invitation.

DALTON NEWS RECORD
DALTON, MASS.
W. 2,300

AUG 12 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Offering Final Concert Weekend Aug. 20-22

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert. The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Pianist Alexis WEissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Sumphonic etudes.

Ozawa conducts the final Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31. "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission Mr. Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz 'The Damnation of Faust' will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 14 1971 New England Newsclip

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000

AUG 13 1971 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD SEASON AT THE FINAL STAGE

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass —Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 P.M. in the Shed. Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert. The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Garrick Ohlsoon, the first American Prize Winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, New York. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. This summer he performs at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor. During the 1971-72 season, Mr. Ohlsoon will give concerts in London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Milan, Dusseldorf and Baden-Baden as well as performing in San Francisco, Minnesota, Buffalo, Toronto and Houston.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 P.M. in the Shed. Mr. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, at 7 P.M. each Friday evening, two hours before the 9 P.M. Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the 9 P.M. Orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the final Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal Saturday morning, August 21 at 10:30 A.M. in the Shed. Mr. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Tickets may be purchased at the Festival Ricket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, August 21 at 8:30 P.M. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' The Damnation of Faust will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, August 22 at 2:30 P.M. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of Jonh Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer. They made their debut in spring 1970 in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein. Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's Chichester psalms, Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, Mahler's Second symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz' Requiem. For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local Berkshire residents.

John Olvier, a member of the faculty of M.I.T., is director of the M.I.T. Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.

AUG 20 1971 New England Newsclip

music

SILVERMINE'S 13th ANNUAL CHAMBER MUSIC FESTIVAL — Aug. 29, guest artist Seth McCoy, tenor; in Gifford auditorium, Silvermine Guild of Artists, New Canaan.

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Boston Symphony orchestra directed by Seiji Ozawa, tonight (Friday) at 9 p.m., program of Prokofiev, Berlioz and Tchaikowsky; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., program of Mozart, Ravel and Nielsen. Concerts each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Sundays at 2:30 p.m.; weekend preludes Fridays at 7 p.m., two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, present guest artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals at no extra charge to Friday night ticket holders, open rehearsals in the shed each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. for benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, offers a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music, seats are unreserved at $2.50 each and available the morning of the rehearsal; tickets for regular performances are $8.50, $8, $7.50, $7, $6, $5, $4, $4.50, $3.50.

'Damnation of Faust' Set for Final Concert

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Lenox.

Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert.

The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2.

Following intermission, Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture - fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Ohlsson, the first American prize winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, N.Y. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck - Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the final Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal Saturday, Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal benefit the orchestra's pension fund. Tickets may be purchased at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg.

The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass - baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer.

John Oliver, a member of the faculty of M.I.T., is director of the M.I.T. Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

AUG 15 1971

"FAUST" STAR. Ezio Flagello will solo for "The Damnation of Faust" when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents the work next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Seiji Ozawa will be on the podium.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 18 1971

Jacob's Pillow, Lee, Mass. Ritha Devi, who presents a suite of classical Hindu dances, and Lar Lubovitch and Company, who present a varied program.

Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday at 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude with Alexis Weissenberg. 9 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts Prokofiev, "Romeo and Juliet;" Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet Overture. Saturday, at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts a program of Mozart, Ravel and Nielsen, with Alexis Weissenberg. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts a complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," with Lois Marshall, John Alexander, Ezio Flagello and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Bennington College, Bennington, Vt. Composers Conference and Chamber Music Center, concerts Wednesday and Saturday at 8:15 p.m., in the Carriage Barn.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
S. 56,837

AUG 15 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts In Final Week

TANGLEWOOD — Tanglewood Artistic Director Seifi Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday, at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Sumphony at this concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra Saturday evening, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afernoon, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles.

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
D. 31,285

AUG 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Final weekend at Tanglewood

Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the eighth and final weekend concert of 1971 Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday at 9 p.m. in the shed.

Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who is making his debut. The concert will open with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet."

Garrick Ohlsson is the first American Prize Winner of the Chopin International Competiton in Warsaw. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg will be presented at the weekend prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the shed. Weissenberg's recital will include the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the final Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the shed.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra Saturday evening at 8:30 in the shed. Soloist will be pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Thomas will conduct Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' The Damnation of Faust will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, at 2:50 in the shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, will sing the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus will be the Tanglewood Festival Choir with John Oliver, director.

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

AUG 20 1971

Tanglewood Enters Its Final Week

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa will conduce this Friday evening's concert of the eighth and final week-end of the 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the shed at Tanglewood. The concert opens at 9:00 with two pieces by Prokofiev, his suite from Romeo and Juliet and his piano concerto no. 2 with Garrick Ohlsson as soloist. The second half of the program consists of Berliez' love scene from Romeo and Juliet and Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juiet. Pianist Alexis Weissenberg can be heard at 7:00 in the Friday evening prelude to the main concert.

Michael Tilsen Thomas, associate conductor of the BSO will conduct the Saturday evening concert which starts at 9:30. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 (Paris) followed by Ravel's plane concerto in G with Weissenberg as soloist. Following intermission will be Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berliez' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Osawa as the final concert of the 1971 season Sunday afternoon at 2:30. Participating with the orchestra will be the Tanglewood Festival Choir and three soloists.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

AUG 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Final weekend

Ozawa to conduct at Tanglewood

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert. The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Garrick Ohlsson, the first American prize winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, N.Y. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. This summer he performs at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor.

During the 1971-72 season, Mr. Ohlsson will give concerts in London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Milan, Dusseldorf and Baden-Baden as well as performing in San Francisco, Minnesota, Buffalo, Toronto and Houston.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa will also conduct the final symphony open rehearsal Aug. 21 at 10.30 a.m. in the Shed. Mr. Ozawa will rehearse the orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsal are $2.50 each and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Tickets may be purchased at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas will conduct Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 22 at 2.30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed under the direction of, John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer. They made their debut in spring 1970 in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein. Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's "Chichester psalms," Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," Mahler's Second symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz' Requiem. For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood choir which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local Berkshire residents.

John Oliver, a member of the faculty of M.I.T., is director of the M.I.T. Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 16 1971 New England Newsclip

To Perform

Appearing at Tanglewood Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. Ezio Flagello will perform as soloist in "The Damnation of Faust." Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this performance which will end this season's Berkshire Festival.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 6,795

AUG 19 1971 New England Newsclip

Choir Boys To Perform At Tanglewood

Ten boys from the Men's and Boys' Choirs of Saint James's Episcopal Church here have been asked to sing this Sunday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass.

James R. Taylor, organist and choirmaster at the church, said that "we are naturally honored by this opportunity...it will be a great experience for our boys."

The boys from Saint James's, along with eight boys from Christ Church Cathedral in Hartford, will sing in Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," with John Oliver as concertmaster.

The boys, whose ages range from 10-14, are Geoffrey Baldwin, Robert Caccomo, Dunbar Helsley Jr., William Koeucky, Raymond Moyer, Erik Runge, Charles Shelley Jr., Gerald Skenderian, Scott Stephens and Christopher Stevenson. Cathedral choir member Thomas Perry is also from West Hartford.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

AUG 20 1971 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Spectacular weekend planned for final performances of season

Michael Tilson Thomas

LENOX—Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this evening at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert. The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Garrick Ohlsson, the first American Prize Winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, New York. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. This summer he performs at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor. During the 1971-72 season, Mr. Ohlsson will give concerts in London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Milan, Dusseldorf and Baden-Baden as well as performing in San Francisco, Minnesota, Buffalo, Toronto and Houston.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra tomorrow evening, at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' The Damnation of Faust will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, at 2.30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer. They made their debut in spring 1970 in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein. Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's Chichester psalms, Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, Mayler's Second symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz' Requiem. For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local Berkshire residents.

John Oliver, a member of the faculty of M.I.T., is director of the M.I.T. Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 15 1971 New England Newsclip

EZIO FLAGELLO

To sing role of Mephistopleles in "The Damnation of Faust" at Tanglewood.

European Anthem

BERLIN — The parliamentarians of the Council of Europe have adopted Europe's first anthem. They chose Ludwig Van Beethoven's "Ode to Joy," from his Ninth Symphony as the music "most representative of European genius."

Although the council, representing the parliaments of 17 European nations and their foreign ministers, proclaimed a European flag in 1955 — a circle of 12 stars against a field of azure blue — and May 5 as Europe Day, until now it was unable to decide on a hymn for Europe.

One wag at the council's meeting in Berlin suggested that the final vote was influenced by the commercial success of the pop version of "Ode to Joy." The clinching argument, however, was that nearly every European schoolchild is said to know the melody. The only serious competition was Georg Friedrich Handel's "royal Fireworks Music."

The Council has no illusions about millions of Europeans suddenly breaking into choruses of the new anthem. For one thing the anthem still has no words, as the original ones are considered a "universal" expression of faith rather than a "specifically European one." Until a new text can be found, the Council of Europe expects the anthem will be played at European gatherings on the municipal level, and later at meetings of European government leaders and heads of state. It would be played along with national anthems. Some day, Council members think, it might ring out alone as a symbol of an achieved European unity.

European broadcasting stations will be asked to use the new anthem at the end of their daily programs, following the national anthem. Western Europe's "intervision" television network will be approached to change its present musical theme to the Beethoven prelude.

None of the Council's decisions are binding on member parliaments and it can only recommend to the committee ministers, consisting of European foreign ministers, that the anthem be played.

AT TANGLEWOOD

'Faust' Final Concert

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood iday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed.

Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who will make his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert.

The concert will open with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Ohlsson's performance of the Piano concerto No. 2.

Following intermission, Ozawa will conduct Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture - fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Chopin Prize Winner

Ohlsson, the first American prize winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, N.Y. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras.

This summer he will perform at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor. During the 1971-72 season, Ohlsson will give concerts in London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Milan, Dusseldorf and Baden-Baden as well as performing in San Francisco, Minnesota, Buffalo, Toronto and Houston.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg will be presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. His recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes.

Weekend Prelude recitals at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert.

Last Rehearsal

Ozawa will conduct the final Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal Saturday morning Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed, for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsal are $2.50 each and benefit the orchestra's pension fund. Tickets may be purchased at the Festival ticket office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg.

The program wil begin with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano Concerto in G with soloist Weissenberg. Following intermission, Thomas will conduct Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed.

Lois Marshall, soprano, will sing the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander will be Faust and bass - baritone Ezio Flagello will be Mephistopheles. The chorus will be the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, director.

Festival Chorus

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the Greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer.

They made their debut in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein.

Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," Mahler's Second Symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz' Requiem.

For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir, which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local Berkshire residents.

Oliver, a member of the faculty of MIT, is director of the MIT Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 260,961

AUG 15 1971 New England Newsclip

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

AUG 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Alexis Weissenberg

Tanglewood

At the Piano: Eschenbach, Ohlsson, Weissenberg

Christoph Eschenbach will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 at Tanglewood Sunday, Aug. 15 at 2:30 p.m.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony for the concert which will include Xenakis' "Polla Ta Dina" and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetique."

On Saturday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts Mozart's Symphony No. 39 and Mahler's Fourth Symphony with soprano soloist Judith Raskin.

The eighth and final weekend of Tanglewood concerts begins with Ozawa directing the orchestra on Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in Prokofiev's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" and Piano Concerto No. 2 with Garrick Ohlsson as soloist.

Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert, was the first American prize winner at the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw. After winning the competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. This summer he performs at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday, Aug. 20 at 7 p.m. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, Fugue and Variation, Opus 18 and Schumann's Symphonic Ietudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, each Friday evening, two hours before the Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to concert ticketholders.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the final Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano Concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, August 22 at 2:30 p.m. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles.

Ozawa conducts BSO in Tanglewood concert

Bass-baritone Ezio Flagello will sing the role of Mephistopheles in next Sunday's complete performance of "The Damnation of Faust by Hector Berlioz at Tanglewood. Seiji Ozawa will conduct the concert, which is the final event of the Tanglewood season.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday at 9 p.m.

Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert.

The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" and Ohlsson's performance of the Piano Concerto No. 2. Following intermission, Ozawa conducts Berlioz' Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the weekend prelude Friday at 7 p.m. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, Fugue and Variation, Op. 18, and Schumann's Symphonic Etudes. Weekend prelude recitals, at 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra Saturday, at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg.

The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Ozawa as the final concert of the season next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 260,961

AUG 15 1971 New England Newsclip

A very grand occasion

by Harry Neville

The final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season takes place next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., and as befits so grand an occasion Seiji Ozawa has programmed a very grand work: Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," an opus that has been characterized and performed as a dramatic legend, a dramatic symphony, an opera, an oratorio and a cantata.

In the past, "The Damnation" has several times been presented as a stage work, but on Sunday it will receive a concert performance. Moreover, the work will be presented in its entirety, which is noteworthy because of the fact that one usually hears only a few excerpts—"Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs," "Rakoczy March" —from what was once Berlioz's most popular work.

Writing in 1937, English critic J. H. Elliot remarked that "Faust" enjoyed a definite vogue among English choral societies at that time, ". . . even in some of the smaller provincial centers to which the French composer's works is otherwise quite unknown."

Elliot went on to explain this vogue in terms that were not altogether complimentary to the composer. And although Berlioz enjoys a much higher regard nowadays than in 1937, Elliot's argument seems essentially a fair and honest appraisal.

"The score contains innumerable ingenuities," he wrote, "but no very alarming eccentricities . . . The individuality of the score is marked; but it is not so far removed from the usual as to embarrass a listener unprepared for radical innovations."

He spoke of the work's "pleasing tunefulness," asserting that Berlioz's principal difficulty was "to escape the commonplace." The music didn't invariably succeed, he felt, for he summed up by saying that "Faust" is a work in which "the exquisite rubs shoulders with the stale and unprofitable."

"Faust" was completed in 1846 when the composer was 43 years old, but the work really had its inception much earlier—1827, to be exact, when Gerard de Nerval first published his French translation of Goethe's "Faust." Enormously impressed by the translation, Berlioz immediately began work on musical settings of several excerpts, which he then published (at his own expense) as "Eight Scenes from Faust." He then sent the music to Goethe, who had been pleased with de Nerval's handling of his masterpiece.

In the case of Berlioz however, the great man's approbation was not forthcoming. Apparently Goethe sought an opinion of the score from a trusted musical friend, a person of extremely conservative taste and whose judgement turned out to be unfavorable. Berlioz had undoubtedly intended his gesture as a tribute, but for his troubles he received only a rude acknowledgement which Goethe deigned not even to sign.

It was in 1845-46, during his travels in Austria, Hungary, Bohemia and Silesia, that Berlioz returned to the idea of a work based on "Faust."

"As soon as I had made up my mind to do it," he wrote in his memoirs, "I had also to resolve to write most of the libretto myself; for the fragments from Gerard de Nerval's translation which I had set to music 20 years earlier and which I intended to rework and include in the score, plus two or three other scenes written to my instructions by M. Gandonniere before I left Paris, together amounted to less than one-sixth of the work."

The eight sections taken from the earlier work were the Easter hymn, a peasants' chorus, the dream chorus, the rat song, the flea song, the ballad of the king of Thule, Marguerite's romance, and the Soldier's chorus.

Much of the remainder of the score was written on the aforementioned trip, and the composer tells us that he composed it "with an ease such as I have very rarely experienced with any of my other works. I wrote it when and where I could: in coaches, in trains, on steamboats, even in the towns that I visited (this despite all the various responsibilities that my concerts entailed)."

In addition to the "Eight Scenes," one other piece of previously composed music found its way into the score, and that was the superb version of the "Rakoczy March" that Berlioz had written as a patriotic tour de force to please his audiences in Budapest. Esthetically the March might have seemed completely irrelevant to the Faust legend, but this did not prevent Berlioz from using it.

"The extraordinary impression it produced in Pesth induced me to incorporate it in my score," he explains in his memoirs. "I took the liberty of locating my hero in Hungary when the action begins, and of making him witness the passage of the Hungarian army across the plain where he wanders, wrapped in his thoughts . . . I would have had no hesitation in taking him anywhere in the world if the work would have benefitted . . . A person like Faust may, after all, have any journey ascribed to him, no matter how outlandish, without violence being done to plausibility."

As Ernest Newman was later to remark, "Moral criticism would be wasted on one so naked and unashamed as this!"

The first performances of "Faust," in 1846 at the Opera Comique, were fiascos, but the work later achieved immense popularity, especially around the turn of the century. With the decline of choral societies, "Faust" returned to relative obscurity and any revival nowadays is an event to be cherished. Soloists in the Tanglewood performance will be Lois Marshall (Marguerite), John Alexander (Faust) and Ezio Flagello (Mephistopheles).

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

AUG 17 1971 New England Newsclip

'The Damnation of Faust': Final Tanglewood concert

LENOX, Mass. — A complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, August 22 at 2:30 in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer. They made their debut in spring 1970 in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein. Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's "Chicheseer psalms," Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, Mahler's Second symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz' Requiem. For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local Berkshire residents.

In other Tanglewood performances before the final Sunday concert, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

On Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed, Ozawa will conduct with piano soloist Garrick Ohlsson.

The program opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" followed by Chisson's performance of the Piano concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Ozawa conducts Berlioz' love scene from "Romeo and Juliet" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet."

RECORDER GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
D. 14,698

AUG 21 1971 New England Newsclip

Damnation of Faust is Final Program at Tanglewood

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Friday evening concert of the eighth and final weekend of 1971 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Friday, Aug. 20 at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Piano soloist for the evening is Garrick Ohlsson, who makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert. The concert opens with two pieces by Prokofiev: The Suite from Romeo and Juliet followed by Mr. Ohlsson's performance of the Piano Concerto no. 2. Following intermission, Mr. Ozawa conducts Berlioz's love scene from Romeo and Juliet and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy Romeo and Juliet.

Garrick Ohlsson, the first American Prize Winner of the Chopin International Competition in Warsaw, was born in White Plains, New York. After winning the Chopin Competition, he toured Poland and returned to the United States to give performances with the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. This summer he performs at the Saratoga Festival, the Hollywood Bowl, Grant Park in Chicago and at Caramoor. During the 1971-72 season, Mr. Ohlsson will give concerts in London, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, Milan, Dusseldorf and Baden-Baden as well as performing in San Francisco, Minnesota, Buffalo, Toronto and Houston.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg is presented at the Weekend Prelude Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Mr. Weissenberg's recital includes the Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation, Op. 18 and Schumann's Symphonic etudes. Weekend Prelude recitals, at 7 p.m. each Friday evening, two hours before the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, are offered at no extra charge to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the final Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Mr. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets for the rehearsal benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund and may be purchased at the Festival Ticket Office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. in the performance of Mozart's Symphony no. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano Concerto in G with soloist Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

A complete concert performance of Berlioz' The Damnation of Faust will be conducted by Seijo Ozawa as the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon, Aug. 22 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed. Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander is Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The chorus is the Tanglewood Festival Choir, John Oliver, Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members came from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer. They made their debut in spring 1970 in Symphony Hall, Boston, when they took part in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Tanglewood Advisor Leonard Bernstein. Last summer they sang in performances of Bernstein's Chichester psalms, Mozart's Cosi fan tutte, Mahler's Second symphony, Beethoven's Choral fantasia and Ninth symphony and Berlioz's Requiem. For performances of large works, the Chorus is supplemented by the Tanglewood Choir which is made up of students of the Berkshire Music Center and local residents.

John Oliver, a member of the faculty of M.I.T., is director of the M.I.T. Glee Club and the Framingham Choral Society. He is a member of the faculty and director of the chorus at Boston University.

THE DEPOT MOTEL
Rt. 7A · Sheffield, Mass.
Tel. 413-229-8894
Daily, weekly, monthly rates

Where To Go? What To Do?

Summer is almost over, and you'd better get your vacation pictures developed before the September rush.

One summer traveler who has his vacation pictures developed is William Stockdale, of Putnam, Conn. His full-length color motion picture of how his family of nine set out to see Italy the way native Italians might will be shown tonight.

Stockdale, a noted traveler and lecturer, dubbed his film, "Seeing Italy Italian Style". The screening is at Laurel Park at 8 p.m. The film, as well as an appearance by Stockdale, is under the sponsorship of the Laurel Park Assn.

-o- -o- -o-

IN CASE YOU DON'T WANT to attend the showing of Stockdale's films because you're going to see your neighbor's four hour saga of his trip to Goshen State Park, there's always music from the Amherst Folklore Center. Tonight, Steve Martin, of "Orpheus", and Conway Redding will appear at 8. Tomorrow night, Norman Schell of "Clean Living" and Mary Pratt will perform for interested patrons. The non-profit group has scheduled an "Open Hoot" Monday evening. Next Friday, the Prairie Oysters and a program of country rock, is penciled in.

-o- -o- -o-

THE BIG NEWS, though, in music circles, is the final performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

The Symphony plans a concert Saturday evening at 8:30 in the shed, and undertakes a complete concert performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust", Sunday Aug. 22 at 2:30 in the Shed.

-o- -o- -o-

THE TWENTY-SIXTY ANNUAL COMPOSERS' Conference and Chamber Music Center at Bennington, Vt. enters its second week. Concerts are scheduled tonight, Aug. 25 and again August 28. The concerts are planned at the Carriage Barn at the college for 8:15.

-o- -o- -o-

WINDHAM COLLEGE'S SUMMER Collegium in Early Music plans an evening of Medieval and Renaissance Songs, with commentary by Syracuse University Professor of English D. D. Synod grass tonight at 8 p. m. Next Friday, August 27, a program of Sacred Choral music is scheduled.

-o- -o- -o-

THE 1971 FESTIVAL of the Arts at Manchester, Vt. under the Southern Vermont Art Center has galleries and gardens open daily 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. Sundays 1 p. m. to 5 p. m. The Festival is closed Mondays, except for Labo Day.

-o- -o- -o-

OTHER EVENTS this week include an exhibit of old horse-drawn carriages, demonstrations of driving techniques and a parade of carriages in Newport, R. I. The 84th annual State Fair is this week at Plymouth, N. H.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 19 1971 New England Newsclip

RECORD AMERICAN
(ALL DAY)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 415,231

AUG 19 1971

New England Newsclip

97

Rose Walsh

Visitors to Be Greeted

Members of The College Club and the Boston Branch of the American Ass'n. of University Women are invited to meet 48 Foreign University Women, on Saturday evening at a 6 o'clock buffet supper at The College Club, 40 Commonwealth ave.

Here for three days, the foreign visitors have attended the Conference of the International Federation of University Women in Philadelphia. They are from India, Australia, Switzerland, Belgium, Finland, Scotland, Canada, England, France, Germany, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa and Sweden.

Hostesses for the gathering will include Mrs. Frank W. Adams, Mrs. John G. Beebe-Center, Dr. Dorothy W. Weeks, Miss Marie D. MacIntyre, Miss Enid Wilson, Mrs. John C. Leak, Mrs. Hyman Ullman, Miss Beatrice A. Rogers, Dr. Alona E. Evans and Mrs. John M. Maguire with others.

★

Boston relatives of the bridegroom were in Cooperstown, N. Y., last Saturday for the wedding of Miss Amy Clark, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard E. Clark of Cooperstown, to Christopher Brown, son of Mrs. John Q. Hunsicker (Janet Pierce) of Darien, Ct., and William Brown of Cal., and grandson of the late Mr. and Mrs. Walworth Pierce of Boston.

Following the ceremony in St. Mary's Church, Cooperstown, the couple received their friends at Cooperstown Inn.

Given in marriage by her father, the bride was gowned in ivory silk organza appliqued with alencon lace. Her veil was a mantilla of matching lace and illusion, and she carried an old-fashioned bouquet of white roses and miniature carnations.

Ann Adams Clark, maid of honor for her sister, and bridesmaids, Corita Hilser, Theresa Zazagnin, C. Kathryn Huntington and Mary Shephard, wore identical long Empire gowns of pale blue and pink printed silk and carried old-fashioned bouquets of summer flowers.

Wesley Brown attended his brother and another brother, Jeremy, shared usher duties with Donald Epra, James Olsen and Rex Cowdry.

The bride is a graduate of Hartwick College and Greenwich Hospital School of Nursing. Her husband, who was graduated from Yale University in '68, will be on the teaching faculty of Green Farms, Westport, Ct. in the fall.

Mrs. G. Spencer Wentworth of Exeter, N. H. (left), hostess for Saturday night's swinging Gay Nineties Party at Wentworth-by-the-sea, N. H., greets Sherman Bennett, Mrs. Edward M. Conroy, wearing a ballgown made for her late mother, Mrs. Joseph P. Manning and Mrs. Warren Henderson (right).

(Photo by Julie Warn)

★

Final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood Season on Sunday afternoon. 2:30, in the Shed at Lenox, will be a complete performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust" conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Lois Marshall, soprano, sings the role of Marguerite. Tenor, John Alexander is Faust, and bass-baritone, Ezio Flagello is Mephistopheles. The Tanglewood Festival Choir, formed last year under the direction of John Oliver, a member of the faculty of MIT will be the chorus.

Mr. Ozawa, will also conduct the final Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~Open Rehearsal~~ Saturday morning at 10:30 in the Shed for which tickets are $2.50 each and benefit the Orchestra's pension fund.

★

Sept. 3 nuptials have been planned by Miss Ruth Karen Morse and Stefan Collini, as announced by the parents of the bride-to-be, Mr. and Mrs. David Morse of Newton Center. The prospective bridegroom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Collini of Seaford, Sussex, England.

Miss Morse and her fiance are students at Cambridge University, England. She was graduated from Lake Forest College, where she was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and Phi Sigma Iota honorary societies, and is a graduate student at New Hall.

Mr. Collini was graduated from Jesus College, Cambridge University with first class honors, did graduate work at Yale University, and is a doctoral candidate.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 21 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Ozawa Wraps Up Season With Berlioz' 'Damnation'

Seiji Ozawa

The 1971 Tanglewood season comes to a close this weekend with a complete concert performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" conducted by Seiji Ozawa with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus on Sunday, Aug. 22.

The concert will be presented in the shed at 2:30 p.m. and the singers will be Lois Marshall, soprano, in the role of Marguerite, tenor John Alexander as Faust and bass-baritone Ezio Flagello as Mephistopheles.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was formed in 1971 under the direction of John Oliver, director of choral and vocal activities at Tanglewood. Members come from the greater Boston area, and have rehearsed each week during the spring and summer.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the final open rehearsal Saturday morning, Aug. 21 at 10:30 a.m. in the shed. Ozawa rehearses the Orchestra in music for the following day's concert. Tickets are $2.50 each and benefit the Orchestra's pension fund. Tickets may be purchased at the Festival ticket office the morning of the rehearsal.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the Orchestra Saturday evening, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. Soloist is pianist Alexis Weissenberg. The program begins with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 31 "Paris," followed by Ravel's Piano Concerto in G with Alexis Weissenberg. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony.

Warren Fowler

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday, Aug. 21

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
AUG 21 1971

Ohlsson a Smash at Tanglewood

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa, Garrick Ohlsson, piano. At Tanglewood Music Shed, Lenox, Mass. Program: Prokofiev-Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," piano concerto No. 2, Berlioz: Love scene from "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky: Overture to "Romeo and Juliet."

By THEODORE PRICE

Last Night In Review

LENOX, Mass. — Let me put it simply:

Garrick Ohlsson, the first American to win the Chopin International Competition and the soloist on last night's program at Tanglewood, is a pianistic powerhouse.

With Seliji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the six-foot-four, bearded, somewhat bashful boy of 24 played with such breathtaking breadth of tonal quality, such dynamic strength and such technical sensitivity in the Prokofiev second piano concerto that I'm reduced to appreciative obeisance rather than critical dissection.

Ohlsson is scheduled to appear with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra next winter.

By then he will have fully established his place as the rightful successor to Van Cliburn, winner of the Tchaikovsky competition who has been playing the same showpieces for more than 10 years.

Ohlsson, dressed last night in a white suite, blue shirt and floppy bow tie, is another breed of pianist cat. He's a strapping hulk sitting at the piano like a giant, looking like a young Walter Gieseking.

In the bi-tonal dissonances, wide melodic leaps and crushing choral clusters of the Prokofiev concerto, he played with a unique blend of delicacy and power. The first and fourth movements were like molten steel, alive, hot, but flexible in shape and outline. The pace he set in the parallel chains of skittering scales in the scherzo was the work of no boy — he's amazingly mature musically. And the crowd in the Tanglewood music shed shouted and cheered him to return to the stage again and again for bows.

Ozawa, one of the artistic directors of the oldest summer music festival in these Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts, conducted a program geared to his distinctive flair for dramatic music. His program theme was consistent, laden with musical settings of the Romeo and Juliet legend.

In Prokofiev's ballet suite, 36-year-old Ozawa was both flamboyant showman and fascinating interpreter.

Dressed in a long white shirt out at the waist and tux pants, long black hair flowing to his shoulders, Ozawa infused the five dance movements with an ultra-dynamism which brings out the full flavors of this heady score.

Tomorrow afternoon Ozawa, who is the musical director of the San Francisco Symphony during the winter season, closes the 1971 season of this granddaddy summer music festival (it opened in 1938) with a performance of Hector Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499
AUG 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Ohlsson's Prokofiev Shows Power, Ease

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Romance permeated the damp air at Tanglewood Friday night.

Rhythmic Security

Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through excerpts from three works based on the Romeo-Juliet story and Garrick Ohlsson was soloist for Prokofiev's Second Piano Concerto.

Ohlsson is a big, burly young man (23) with a short beard and long fingers.

He moved through Prokofiev's icy crags and tangled jungles with apparent ease and with the recklessness and power of a drag-strip driver.

Profundity and depth in the usual musical sense are not necessary to the success of Prokofiev's piano concertos but strength, stamina, dexterity and a highly trained rhythmic security are absolutely necessary and Ohlsson has them.

The performance was (Ozawa and the orchestra included) of the special sort that set Prokofiev's blinding entertainment free, and the word entertainment is used carefully because that for me is Prokofiev's primary value.

The orchestra's Romeo-Juliet pieces were taken from Prokofiev's suite, Opus 64; Berlio's "Romeo and Juliet," Opus 17, and Tchaikovsky's overture-fantasy of the same title.

Five pieces from Prokofiev's suite opened the program and were presented by Ozawa with brilliant color.

But of course that's the way Prokofiev is supposed to sound.

The Berlioz "Love Scene" sounded as if the orchestra had been given an intermission pep talk by Mozart the moment he uttered that famous bit of advice. . ."It must flow like oil."

The orchestra's violins were coming across with silken clarity and unwavering steadiness in spite of the unusually high humidity.

They were nicely lush too for the Tchaikovsky that ended the program. The sound was moist like the air. . .which is right for Romeo and Juliet as well as Tchaikovsky.

Alexis Weissenberg, pianist, and a downpour arrived nearly together to begin the 7 p.m. weekend prelude program. The rain diminished as the audience's enthusiasm increased.

Weissenberg is an incredible pianist; he has steel fingers and unbelievable control of them. There are moments when he begins a passage so fast he raises a suspicion he cannot finish without stumbling.

But he almost never falters and this technical reliability has caused some listeners to shelve him a sa musical mechanic. They can't have been listening very closely, because he also has a fine command of the subtleties and nuances of pianistic expression.

He played Franck's "Prelude, Eugue and Variation" as arranged for piano by Harold Bauer, and Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," Opus 13.

They were beautiful as well as inicsive. Weissenberg seems to have lost none of the machine-like precision he had at Tanglewood a couple of years ago and to have gained a high degree of emotional sensitivity.

The Franck-Bauer was gentle and peaceful and the Schumann etudes were full of snap and bite or tranquility according to need.

Today the 34th Berkshire Music Festival will end its season with Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust" with five soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, boy choristers from Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 186,767
AUG 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Pianist Ohlsson triumphs as Tanglewood season ends

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

PROGRAM
Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" — Prokofieff
Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Qpus 16 — Prokofieff
Garrick Ohlsson, pianist
Love scene from the dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet" — Berlioz
Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasie — Tchaikovsky

LENOX — Grarrick Ohlsson's debut as piano soloist with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood was a triumph Friday night at the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's eighth and final weekend.

The orchestra and conductor Seiji Ozawa gave Ohlsson far more than a routine background for Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, Opus 16.

Balance of the program was three far flung settings to scenes and sundry emotional upheavals from Romeo and Juliet.

The audience numbered 6,191, manifesting unusual interest in a Friday night program. Several hundred patrons put up with grounds that were still sogging from a heavy rainfall.

Worcester Benefit

Worcester heard Ohlsson while he was still a 16-year-old student at White Plains (N.Y.) High School. He assisted a noted Swedish guitarist in a Fairlawn Hospital benefit concert in 1965 at Chandler Street Junior High School.

It took very little time to determine that the guitarist's best efforts were all but totally eclipsed by Ohlsson's brilliant performance of Beethoven's "Appasionata" sonata. After Worcester Ohlsson was the first American prize winner of the Chopin International competition in Warsaw and has toured the big festivals and is about to embark on a heavy international tour.

Although the Prokofieff piano concerto is essentially a keyboard tempest, Ohlsson found it possible to include a liquid singing one that's hard to come by.

The young pianist owes much to Ozawa. Not only did the conductor let it be a true dialogue between solo instrument and orchestra, but repeatedly made tempo adjustments due to Ohlsson's constant concentration on his keyboard and little observance of the baton.

In the march-like scherzo, Ohlsson applied himself with percussion-dealing hands. Ringing sonorities were achieved in the long cadenza without pounding and the pianist tossed of Prokofieff's ridiculous technical demands with verve.

Ohlsson gave a dazzling account of the finale for which he set a jet speed. The total effect was dash pyrotechnics and clear exposure of the composer's undiluted irony.

Audience applause lasted for four curtain calls. Ozawa got Prokofitff's Romeo and Juliet suite off to a dramatic start complete with tremulant phrases and blasts. Romeo and Juliet's tomb was powerful in brass, tense in strings and emotionally stirring. Elsewhere were pastel-like shades virtuosic playing set to steely rhythms and splashes of color.

After the fireworks and heavy drama of Prokofieff's works, the love scene from Berlioz's dramatic symphony of Romeo and Juliet was somewhat pallid.

Uneventful Berlioz

If it was included to present the love pair in triplicate (with the Tchaikovsky version), the reason wasn't enough. The playing and results were expressively conscientious and quite uneventful.

Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet Overture-Fantasie stood on its own as a nostalgic drama generating highlights of the familiar story. Orchestra and conductor gave it all there is.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 133,867
AUG 23 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Faust —A Moving Legend

By DOROTHY STOWE

All forces — choral, orchestral and solo — combined yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood under the direction of Seiji Ozawa to present Berlioz' great dramatic legend, "La Damnation de Faust."

"Shakespeare and Goethe: the silent confidants of my torments; they hold the key to my life." So wrote Berlioz to a friend in 1828, when, as a young man of 25, he fell under the spell of the de Nerval translation of "Faust."

Fifteen years later he conducted the first performance of "The Damnation" in Paris, which was little understood or appreciated, since by then he had created a Faust uniquely his own, based on the mystery and profundity of the situation, but only indirectly related to Goethe.

Yet to a modern audience it is almost always profoundly moving.

Under the direction of Ozawa, the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood Chorus (again ably coached by John Oliver) made an excellent showing.

Especially in the second half, all forces warmed to the task, and the performance of the panoramic scenes — the ride to the Abyss, the pandemonium of hell and the angelic choir could hardly have been improved upon.

Incidentally, the Boys' Choirs from Hartford's Christ Church Cathedral and St. James's Church of West Hartford performed in this finale to good effect.

The Rakoczy March, the scene in Auerbach's cellar, everything fast and frenetic came off with excellent effect. However, one could have wished for a less ponderous touch in the slow and light sections. The lovely ballet of the sylphs and dance of the will-o'-the-wisps badly needed a certain Gallic lightness which was lacking in the Handelian treatment they received.

Often more skill could be used at Tanglewood in suiting the singer to his task. Such was the case yesterday, when the soloists without exception seemed ill-suited to their roles.

To the lyric, rapturous Faust (so well realized by Nicolai Gedda) John Alexander brought a somewhat forced and overly-dramatic tone.

Lois Marshall's middle register seemed too thick for the virginal Marguerite, although they presented an impassioned love duet.

Ezio Flagello sang in his usual luscious bass but with little hint of the cynical, diabolic Mephistopheles. He was heard to best effect in the mocking Serenade, and contributed best dramatically in the ride to the Abyss.

Almost 9,000 fans wildly applauded this concluding production of the 1971 Shed Concerts.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1971

New England Newsclip

MUSIC REVIEW

Seiji Ozawa Is Triumphant in Final Tanglewood Weekend of Season

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

OVATIONS are such a usual thing at Tanglewood and so often are tendered with but a modicum of discrimination that when one which is so indisputably deserved takes place, there may be a suspicion that it still may be contaminated by crowd psychology. However, following the last, quiet, awesome chorus of angels welcoming Marguerite into their celestial company, the tribute to Seiji Ozawa, who had conducted Berlioz' dramatic legend, "La Damnation de Faust," yesterday afternoon could not have been more spontaneous and genuine.

Ozawa had created an aura of grandeur from the start, aided by four splendid soloists: soprano Lois Marshall as Marguerite, tenor John Alexander as Faust, bass Ezio Flagello as Mephistopheles, and Saverio Barbieri as Brander, first, and later as the "voice on earth"; and by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director; and the Boys Chorus from the choirs of Christ Church Cathedral of Hartford and St. James's Church of West Hartford, Raymond J. Glover and James R. Taylor, conductors.

* * *

IT IS NOT without a bit of shrewd premeditations, as well as a sense of the dramatic, that Berlioz, after the tremendous climax he builds up in the terrifying gallop to Pandemonium, Milton's capitol of Hell, and realizing that when one is on the summit he cannot go higher, subsides practically into silence. After employing every resource an orchestra, augmented chorus and percussion (including dreadful gongs), all at the apogee of their potential, can arouse, he dismisses nearly all of them and allows only a thin wisp of sound to recede further and further into beatific desuetude, and brings his magnum opus to a memorable close. One wondered how long the spell would last before being broken by applause.

* * *

THE FINAL 1971 week was an Ozawa triumph. The young conductor whose entire professional career has been intertwined with the Berkshire Music Center for all his artistically mature years was assigned two of the three weekend programs. Besides the Berlioz yesterday, he devoted his program Friday night to the version of Romeo and Juliet as it had inspired three different composers, Prokofieff, Berlioz and Tchaikovsky.

No literary works equal Goethe's Faust and Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" as launching pads for musical flights of romance, emotion and drama. Over the years the protagonists of these two epic plays have almost risen from the printed pages and been ascribed anthropomorphous dimensions. Indeed, in Verona Juliet is considered an avatar and one may visit the tomb of the demure maiden and come up from the vault to stand under the balcony where the fervent Romeo besought her favor, just as Shylock's house is pointed out in Venice and as Sherlock Holmes's quarters at 221B Baker St. are marked in London.

* * *

THE DEVELOPMENT of Ozawa in this present Tanglewood season was apparent in his Friday program. It was his most articulate achievement of the season. He eschewed indicating several obvious entrances to his extremely mature body of musicians and concentrated on the waves and depressions, the elevations and valleys of the luscious musical terrain through which he was wending his way. He came up with spectacular climax after climax.

A suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" was opulent for his purpose. It is introduced with almost brutally dissonant brass chords which are cut off with a scimitar to reveal the masterfully contrived effect of a watercolor sunrise appearing in pusillanimous strings. A trifle broader pace might have better invoked the memory of Nureyev leaping to the magnificently imaginative rhythm of the schottische.

Berlioz's "Love Scene" from his dramatic symphony on the same book is tremendously moving. His unique intuition guides him in his orchestration to place the passionate opening theme in the sonorous violas and cellos of the orchestra, and one's cup of gratification moves near to running over.

* * *

IN THE TCHAIKOVSKY overture-fantasy, still on the same subject, Ozawa loosened all the spigots of his superabundant casks of excitement and sensitivity and allowed his conception to run riot in extravagant rhapsody.

The winner of a recent Chopin international piano competition made his Tanglewood debut in the Prokofieff G Minor Concerto, No. 2. Garrick Ohlson, 24-year-old White Plains native, a large, strong man, played the essentially percussive concerto with an admirable control of plangent power without sacrificing tonal appeal. When fitting, he took flight fearlessly, and then when proper, he receded to the quiet, naive simplicity of the folk tunes Prokofieff invokes. Prokofieff bids the orchestra desist at several points along the progress of the concerto and gives the soloist total spotlight. These intervals were often the most demanding of the work, but Ohlson encompassed them with ecstacy within complete control.

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING was a near-miss on several points. A symphony for double orchestra, in E Flat, No. 1, of Johann Christian Bach was sprightly, and the third movement, the last, was a buoyant jig. Michael Tilson Thomas injected himself just sufficiently to give it veal and zigor.

But the rest of the program needed a couple of aspirin, both before and after. Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, Opus 50, well deserved to get a hearing, and on that score Thomas should be credited with several points. Nielsen was a Dane and a contemporary of Sibelius, but it would be a disservice to both to attempt to forge a link between them because of time and geography. Nevertheless, Nielsen lends himself, that is, his music, to the visualization of a bleak, monotonous terrain which only in the aggregate builds up to massive proportions.

A dispassionate introduction develops into ponderosity, with excessive weight being assigned to the lower registers. It is relieved only by an effectively somber soliloquy played beautifully by principal clarinetist Harold Wright. There are but two divisions to the symphony, but there are many episodes of contrasting import and color within each one, notably a fugue using an idiom like an army call in 6/8 time. The whole seemed tipped over by an ungrateful orchestration. There were few details with appeal and even though Thomas worked hard to infuse character into the long pages, he succeeded mainly in adding his thumb to the scales.

* * *

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG was the soloist in the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto, No. 1, in B Flat Minor, Op. 23. Tanglewood had already heard this work on an earlier program this season, and it's a good question to ask if a man can eat two plank steaks a-running. Weissenberg, however, is not an artist to treat less than respectfully because of preceding events. He had to contend with an unsympathetic orchestral accompaniment, one that at times seemed to be like a motor in neutral and completely lacking in motion or momentum. Yet the soloist was impressive in his tonal and poetic treatment of phrases, lingering almost excessively on details, and in other situations hurling his hands with prestidigitatorial accuracy and startling artistic achievement.

In view of the uncertain weather, the attendance was surprisingly good. When Thomas raised his baton for the initial note of the evening, the heavens responded with an instant thunderous growl which caused the conductor to lower his arms and smile, thereby winning an extra preconcert round of applause from an audience predisposed to share mild misery. Thereafter, the heavens didn't dare interfere.

Attendance figures for season may be found in a story on the first page of the second section.

Whitestone

WITH UPRAISED ARMS, conductor Seiji Ozawa prepares to bring the Sunday concert to a close and end the Tanglewood season for the year. An audience of 8,949 was present. Total weekend attendance, 25,283.

100

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 23 1971

Conductor Thomas, at 27, Is Brisk at Tanglewood

By LAURIE MODELL

Saturday evening's Tanglewood concert began with a clap of thunder and a flash of lightning that were curiously contrasted with the piece that began the program: Johann Christian Bach's gentle Symphony for for Double Orchestra in E flat. Throughout the work occasional rumblings could be heard from outside the shed, but the storm never broke and the concert as usual turned out to be delightful.

Johann Christian Bach's music shows little of the characteristics of his famous father's; rather, the music exhibits the rhythmic drive beneath song-like melodies that was to find its culmination in the music of Mozart. Mozart was in fact a student of J. C. Bach's, and his Haffner Symphony closely resembles this work in both themes and style.

Conductor for the evening was Michael Tilson Thomas, who at the age of 27 is already associate conductor of the Boston Symphony and will assume the role of musical director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in the fall. He is a brisk, intent stylist with a love for rhythmic drive and pulsation, and a stance on the podium that is colorful without being theatrical.

The work that best displayed his prodigious talents, however, was not the Bach, but rather the Nielson Fifth Symphony which followed it. Carl Nielson, the Dane (1865-1931), wrote much of his music during the World War I era, and his ideas are strongly political. Without knowing anything about this work, one could clearly see in it elements of conflict; fear screeching in the high woodwinds; string melodies, clam and lyrical, are constantly interrupted by insistant snare drum and tympani that rattle the nerves and upset the melodic tranquility. Mr. Thomas was really masterful in this work — he drove the orchestra, particularly the brass and percussion, relentlessly, and the result was one of satisfied emotional exhaustion for both audience and players.

* * *

The evening ended with that much-overplayed standard, the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. Soloist Alexis Weissenberg gave the first movement a somewhat unorthodox interpretion however, playing it slowly and deliberately, but to good effect, despite a rather miserable sounding bass that was more the fault of the weather than the piano. His tone is sharply percussive which is perfectly suited to the scherzos of the second and third movements, but which occasionally seemed a bit heavy for the romanticism of the first. However, to his credit, he lightened considerably as the piece wore on, and the third movement was really fantastic, filled with drive, excitement and flawless pianism.

He has one bad habit, though, of deciding on an effect and then re-using it again and again: for example, he would consistently play the first statement of a theme loudly and heavily and the second statement lightly and accented. This pairing of theme statements occurs too often in Tchaikovsky for this to seem original and effective more than once or twice. Towards the end of the movement, however, he seemed to toss all his plans and forethought to the wind, and he played with an abandonment and spontaneity that did justice to the work.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 23 1971

New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 23 1971

Ozawa, Boston Symphony Not Up to Tanglewood Billing

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — The Tanglewood season drew to a close yesterday afternoon as Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust".

The score is an uneven one, but it contains a great deal of beautiful and exciting music. Given Mr. Ozawa's brilliant performance last year of the Berlioz "Requiem", yesterday's concert promised to be one of the summer's highlights. This listener was greatly surprised and disappointed when the prediction was not fulfilled.

MUCH HAS BEEN written lately of Berlioz' classic-romantic stylistic paradox. It is difficult, however, to generalize in those terms about Mr. Ozawa's performance. The spectacular passages didn't lack for excitement, but they also had considerable restraint. The Rakoczy March, for example, sounded like Berlioz; not Lizst.

On the other hand, this listener would have preferred a more chaste approach in the poignant sections (the love duet was truly pushed), and the lightly scored faster passages often seemed under articulated. Yet the airiness obtained in the Ballet of the Sylphs and the conclusion of the "Menuet des follets" was a minor orchestral miracle.

Mr. Ozawa made a whopping cut which encompassed practically the entire "Pandemonium" episode. This not only deprived the score of one of its most "theatrically" effective moments, but also lessened the contrast of the following "In Heaven" passage, itself beautifully performed.

John Alexander, as Faust, gave the most consistently satisfying performance of the afternoon. Lois Marshall, as Marguerite, occasionally overextended. Ezio Flagello, the Mephistopheles, was the most vocally endowed of the principals. His bass is a big and handsome one, but Berlioz specified a baritone. Mr. Flagello was able to cope easily with the range, but his singing lacked incisiveness.

It is difficult to factor out the causes for what went wrong yesterday: Ths listener's own idiosyncratic taste, Mr. Ozawa's conception, the difficulties posed in making uneven music viable, or problems due to insufficient rehearsal time. At the least, however, we should be greatful to Mr. Ozawa for letting us hear the score.

Tanglewood Finale Spirited

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The atmosphere at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon was full of high spirits: the weather was great, the music was dynamic and the Boston Symphony Orchestra members had just signed a new labor contract which would eventually give them a raise.

School's Out

Not only that, they were going on vacation and they played like kids on the last day of school. It was the final concert of the 1971 Tanglewood season. Attendance for the eight weeks was 217,022, an increase of 14,034 over 1970's festival.

Seija Ozawa, a conductor who looks as if he is having more fun than anybody, was on the podium. The music was the complete "Damnation of Faust, a Dramatic Legend," by Berlioz. . .52 minutes before intermission, 58 after.

Berlioz was one of the musical expanders who forced symphony orchestras to become big, and bigness is one of the attributes of his "Faust." The orchestra was augmented by a 140-voice chorus and four vocal soloists plus a 20-voice boy choir in the final chorus.

Brisk Pace

Key man in the lively proceedings, of course, was the conductor, Ozawa. He conducted from memory, which is rare for a work of this complexity, and he set a brisk pace.

His exhortations for variances in volume, climactic crescendoes and exciting changes in speeds filled the music with energy and momentum.

Specially memorable choral moments came during the satirical Amen Chorus in Part 2 and the closing Apotheosis. Most exciting orchestral moment was, as expected, the famous "Rakoci" march.

Really satisfying moments contributed by soloists included Faust's (John Alexander) lyrical contemplation at the start of Part 3, Marguerite's (Lois Marshal) "King of Thule" in Part 2 and "Spinning Song" in Part 4, and the Faust-Marguerite love duet in Part 3.

Virtues Outnumber Flaws

There were a few flaws: The chorus was occasionally ragged with entrances and sometimes blurry in transitions; Miss Marshall's soprano was at first muffed and throaty; Alexander's tenor lost security when forced at high levels.

There were many virtues: the chorus was balanced and full of vigorous spirit (a crucial value); Miss Marshall's soprano was deep and full and impassioned; Alexander's tenor was dramatic and intense; Ezio Flagello's baritone (Mephistopheles) had the happy quality of insidious supplication and malevolence in turns. He was an oily devil.

The audience (8949) stood and cheered in waves for nine minutes when Marguerite was finally sent to heaven at the close of the music. . .and the season.

Saturday Night

Saturday night Michael Tilson Thomas conducted a program for 7158 listeners that was unusual for its variety of stylistic atmosphere: cool - hot - straight - eccentric.

Alexander Weissenberg was the piano soloist and he again displayed the incredible speed and steely machine-like mode of expression he showed at Tanglewood a couple of years ago, attributes he had mercifully subdued during his one hour recital for the weekend prelude program here Friday.

Friday his music was flexible and expressive. Saturday for the first and third movements of Tchaikovsky's First Piano Concerto it was hard, unfeeling, unbelievable, agile and acrobatic and structurally seriously distorted.

Side Show Effect

Weissenberg probably has the fastest accurate fingers at work on any keyboard anywhere. But this astonishing facility has led him into a kind of musical side show. The viewer is struck dumb by his feats and tends to lose sight of how far the music is being pulled out of shape.

Thomas performed a heroic job as traffic cop, cueing the orchestra's starts anud stops to coincide with the pianist's spasmodic spurt.

Earlier Thomas and the orchestra had opened the program with a delightful presentation of Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra Opus 18 No. 1. Johann Christian was the famous Johann Sebastian's youngest son and distinguished himself in London as one of Mozart's teachers and as a composer who contributed importantly to the transition from baroque-rococo to classical.

Neilson Symphony

Thomas helped the orchestra — divided roughly down the middle into two complementing chamber orchestras — to play this happy music with light neat hands.

The Clark Neilson Symphony (No. 5) which preceded intermission was much longer 35 minutes) and more colorful but may fade from favor long before the Bach piece.

The music of Neilson (who died in 1931) has had a resurgence of support in recent years that crosses all age levels. Its traditional harmonies hold the older generations and its assertive brassy tone patterns and percussive strength have attracted youth.

But as expertly conducted as it was Saturday by Thomas, it still seemed to offer enough aimless milling around to compromise its intention as a work of substance. It had many fans in the orchestra, however.

Last Night In Review

'Wave Makers' At Tanglewood

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor, Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At Tanglewood Music Shed, Lenox, Mass. PROGRAM: J. C. Bach: Symphony for Double Orchestra, Nielsen: Symphony No. 5, Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1.
Seiji Ozawa, conductor, Lois Marshall, soprano, John Alexander, tenor, Ezio Flagello, bass, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. PROGRAM: Berlioz: "Damnation of Faust."

By THEODORE PRICE

LENOX, Mass — The 1971 Berkshire Festival season at Tanglewood closed this weekend with Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts conducted by two young conductors who are, each in his own unique style, making waves in international Symphonic circles.

Yesterday afternoon for an audience of 8,949, Seiji Ozawa conducted an electrifying performance of Hector Berlioz' dramatic oratorio "The Damnation of Faust."

Ozawa casts a dramatic net over the entire opera-like work, setting tempos, caressing dynamics and beckoning his large forces like a magician. Simultaneously he acts as a servant of the score, obedient to the last diacritical twitch on the staff.

Ozawa, who is 36, conducted the two-hour-long performance without once opening the score —a tribute to his remarkable memory and his prodigious musicianship. As on Friday evening he was conducting a work for which he has keen affinity.

He blends scenes of diverse nature into dramatic wholes. The Leipzig tavern chorus of men, the pastoral ballet of the sylphs followed by the student-soldier chorus was a mosaic of musical continuity one seldom hears in such quick-shift junctures.

The 140-voice Tanglewood Festival Chorus was proof that effective use can be made of a smallish choir when it is well-prepped (thanks to its chorusmaster John Oliver) for crisp French enunciation and healthy-voiced projection of the music.

Metropolitan opera tenor John Alenander was a marvelous Faust, baritone Ezio Flagello an even more effective Mephistopheles. Three slashing trombone chords and—kazoom. Flagello's dramatically exuberant voice slithers like a devilish panther across the tonal canvas, followed by Alexander's anguished appeals for love and freedom.

Soprano Lois Marshall as Marguerite used the rich, warm, dark texture of her lower voice to great advantage. However, while she sang an atmospheric "King of Thule" and a romance of extraordinary pathos, she seemed poorly matched for the duet with Alexander whose flexibility and timbre were made for this role.

Nineteen voices from the boys choruses in Christ

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . magician

EZIO FLAGELLO
. . . exuberant

Church Cathedral and St. James' Church near Hartford, Conn., sang in the Apotheosis of Marguerite which closes this vocal-symphonic extravaganza on an unmatched ethereal plane.

SATURDAY NIGHT WHEN associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas raised his baton for Johann Christian Bach's E-flat Symphony for double orchestra, a loud thunderclap threatened outside the music shed.

Thomas lowered his arm looked over his shoulder, then

Please turn page

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 23 1971
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD

From 1C

looked at the tip of the baton. The Boston players and the audience roared with laughter.

Then in the Bach (composed by Johann Sebastian's youngest son) and his regenerative interpretation of the Karl Nielsen Fifth Symphony during the first half of the concert, 26-year-old Thomas revealed his own artistic thunder.

It's certainly no surprise that he has risen so high so quickly in the public ear since he took over a New York concert for ailing William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, in fall 1969.

The Nielsen Fifth, like the Bach being performed for the first time at Tanglewood, has become the most popular of the late Danish composer's six symphonies. Its two movements epitomize conflict and resolution.

In the Ostinato, snare drum snarls the lyrical plateau of the first movement, one hears the overlapping edges of savagery and sublimity. The second movement with its two fugues sheds a consistently brighter light and mood.

Thomas infused the Nielsen with taut ensemble—cellos and horns, violins and flutes addressed themselves as one, united voice—and he defined inner voices with all the clarity of an Oriental etching.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg performed a rather quixotic version of Tchaikovsky's b-flat minor concerto. His slower-than-traditional tempos worked towards good contrasts when he recklessly drove through the scherzando in the slow movement. But in the outer movements this approach dulled dynamic edges.

As in Friday evening's weekend prelude, fugue and variation, Schumann's symphonic etudes and three encores, Weissenberg seemed to be at his best in introspective musical moments.

In Saturday Night's concert, the strongest impression had been made by Thomas. Purely from the point of view inherent in his programming of the Bach and Nielsen, it looks as if he will probably thicken the symphonic bloodstream of Buffalo where this fall he becomes musical director and conductor of eight concert pairs during the winter season.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
AUG 23 1971

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
AUG 23 1971
New England Newsclip

9,000 persons applaud BSO at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A final day audience of nearly 9,000 stood and cheered for nine minutes at the end of the 1971 Boston Symphony Orchestra summer season at Tanglewood Sunday.

Conductor Seiji Ozawa led orchestral, choral and solo forces in the season-concluding performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

Attendance for the eight weeks was 217,022, an increase of 14,034 over 1970.

Berlioz Concert Closes Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The eighth and final weekend of the 34th Berkshire Music Festival ended yesterday afternoon with Seiji Ozawa conducting a glamorized performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust."

Participants were the Boston Symphony, Tanglewood Festival Chorus of 140 singers, and 20 members of the choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, and St. James's Church, West Hartford.

Soloists for the Berlioz: Lois Marshall, soprano, Marguerite; John Alexander, tenor, Faust; Ezio Flagello, baritone, Mephistopheles; Saverio Barbieri, bass, Brander.

Weekend attendance was 25,283.

Figures released by the Tanglewood press office yesterday show a total summer attendance of 217,022, as against last summer's 202,988.

This includes 24 regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, eight open rehearsals, Boston Pops-at-Tanglwood, and Tanglewood-on-Parade.

Three Tuesday night "Contemporary Trends" concerts were given this summer, attended by 20,357. Last summer's six such programs attracted 54,419.

Two special features marked yesterday's stirring "Damnation of Faust."

Beautiful Sound

Some of the most beautiful sound of this summer, and those that came before, was heard in the concluding "Chorus of Angels," in which the youngsters from Hartford participated.

Ozawa kept a closed score before him and conducted the entire work from memory, even to phrasing recitatives for the soloists.

His control of complex strands of voices and instruments was complete, even to an Amen in fugue form that he cued down to the minutest detail.

Over and above this superlative exhibition of podium mechanics, Ozawa exposed the full content of Berlioz' blazing, ornate, gripping music.

Only Flagello sang understandable French, but anyone with a sketchy knowledge of the text (vaguely adapted from the Goethe) sensed the words, situations and drama were in close juxtaposition with the music performance.

Orchestra at Best

The orchestra was at its best, and that's a panacea. The chorus was totally involved with its function and so well versed that they rose on cue as if shot out of a cannon. The youngsters were marvelous and sang from memory.

Barrel-chested Flagello with a vibrant, rolling baritone not only sang superbly but virtually lived the sardonic role without having to illustrate the point. Here was the old pro in his element.

Alexander's Faust had a clear tenor that approached dramatic status with little evidence of strain. But he could well have been mistaken for Radames or Lieutenant Pinkerton.

Miss Marshall sang her Marguerite with scholarly emotion, pleasing voice with a deep low range, and little resemblance to the story's heroine.

Barbieri sang resonantly and competently, but would have made a better impression almost anywhere else than on a platform with Flagello.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted Saturday night's concert with Alexis Weissenberg in Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1.

There were too many liabilities to rate the evening as a high standard Tanglewood event.

Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra was

Music Reviews

pickily exact and quite wooden. Form was lucidly traced for those who were keeping track. Tempos of the two allegros were slightly stepped up.

The slight tartness in Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony somehow sounded conventional, even after the Bach. Strings produced their melodies in radiant sounds. Workmanship was first class, but still left a tinsel impression about the whole work, especially in the novel use of snare drum.

In some instances, Thomas' generalities led to disunity. Nor was one likely to mistake racket for pomposity. However, it did give Thomas opportunity to use some of his standardized, elaborate gestures.

He used a kind of swimming style to tow the orchestra through the mid-stream allegro. The four-part fugue was clear in voices and unified as a whole.

Weissenberg stormed through the Tchaikovsky Concerto leaving a trail of wrong notes behind him. The more soulful passages were played with apparent affection, singing tone and a good poetic sense.

The pianist alterred some facets of the score to suit his fancy. But it only proved that there's very little palpitating romance to be extracted from pure "schmaltz."

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor
Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, Opus 18, No. 1 — J. C. Bach
Symphony No. 5, Opus 50 — Nielsen
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Opus 23 — Tchaikovsky
Sunday Afternoon
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
The Damnation of Faust, Dramatic Legend, Opus 24 — Berlioz
Lois Marshall, soprano
John Alexander, tenor
Ezio Flagello, baritone
Saverio Barbieri, bass
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Boys Chorus from Choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford
St. James's Church, West Hartford

Last Night In Review

'Wave Makers' At Tanglewood

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor, Alexis Weissenberg, piano. At Tanglewood Music Shed, Lenox, Mass. PROGRAM: J. C. Bach: Symphony for Double Orchestra, Nielsen: Symphony No. 5, Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto No. 1.
Seiji Ozawa, conductor, Lois Marshall, soprano, John Alexander, tenor, Ezio Flagello, bass, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. PROGRAM: Berlioz: "Damnation of Faust."

By THEODORE PRICE

LENOX, Mass — The 1971 Berkshire Festival season at Tanglewood closed this weekend with Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts conducted by two young conductors who are, each in his own unique style, making waves in international Symphonic circles.

Yesterday afternoon for an audience of 8,949, Seiji Ozawa conducted an electrifying performance of Hector Berlioz' dramatic oratorio "The Damnation of Faust."

Ozawa casts a dramatic net over the entire opera-like work, setting tempos, caressing dynamics and beckoning his large forces like a magician. Simultaneously he acts as a servant of the score, obedient to the last diacritical twitch on the staff.

Ozawa, who is 36, conducted the two-hour-long performance without once opening the score —a tribute to his remarkable memory and his prodigious musicianship. As on Friday evening he was conducting a work for which he has keen affinity.

He blends scenes of diverse nature into dramatic wholes. The Leipzig tavern chorus of men, the pastoral ballet of the sylphs followed by the student-soldier chorus was a mosaic of musical continuity one seldom hears in such quick-shift junctures.

The 140-voice Tanglewood Festival Chorus was proof that effective use can be made of a smallish choir when it is well-prepped (thanks to its chorusmaster John Oliver) for crisp French enunciation and healthy-voiced projection of the music.

Metropolitan opera tenor John Alenander was a marvelous Faust, baritone Ezio Flagello an even more effective Mephistopheles. Three slashing trombone chords and—kazoom. Flagello's dramatically exuberant voice slithers like a devilish panther across the tonal canvas, followed by Alexander's anguished appeals for love and freedom.

Soprano Lois Marshall as Marguerite used the rich, warm, dark texture of her lower voice to great advantage. However, while she sang an atmospheric "King of Thule" and a romance of extraordinary pathos, she seemed poorly matched for the duet with Alexander whose flexibility and timbre were made for this role.

Nineteen voices from the boys choruses in Christ

SEIJI OZAWA
. . . magician

EZIO FLAGELLO
. . . exuberant

Church Cathedral and St. James' Church near Hartford, Conn., sang in the Apotheosis of Marguerite which closes this vocal-symphonic extravaganza on an unmatched ethereal plane.

SATURDAY NIGHT WHEN associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas raised his baton for Johann Christian Bach's E-flat Symphony for double orchestra, a loud thunderclap threatened outside the music shed.

Thomas lowered his arm looked over his shoulder, then

Please turn page

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 23 1971
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD

From 1C

looked at the tip of the baton. The Boston players and the audience roared with laughter.

Then in the Bach (composed by Johann Sebastian's youngest son) and his regenerative interpretation of the Karl Nielsen Fifth Symphony during the first half of the concert, 26-year-old Thomas revealed his own artistic thunder.

It's certainly no surprise that he has risen so high so quickly in the public ear since he took over a New York concert for ailing William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, in fall 1969.

The Nielsen Fifth, like the Bach being performed for the first time at Tanglewood, has become the most popular of the late Danish composer's six symphonies. Its two movements epitomize conflict and resolution.

In the Ostinato, snare drum snarls the lyrical plateau of the first movement, one hears the overlapping edges of savagery and sublimity. The second movement with its two fugues sheds a consistently brighter light and mood.

Thomas infused the Nielsen with taut ensemble—cellos and horns, violins and flutes addressed themselves as one, united voice—and he defined inner voices with all the clarity of an Oriental etching.

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg performed a rather quixotic version of Tchaikovsky's b-flat minor concerto. His slower-than-traditional tempos worked towards good contrasts when he recklessly drove through the scherzando in the slow movement. But in the outer movements this approach dulled dynamic edges.

As in Friday evening's weekend prelude, fugue and variation, Schumann's symphonic etudes and three encores, Weissenberg seemed to be at his best in introspective musical moments.

In Saturday Night's concert, the strongest impression had been made by Thomas. Purely from the point of view inherent in his programming of the Bach and Nielsen, it looks as if he will probably thicken the symphonic bloodstream of Buffalo where this fall he becomes musical director and conductor of eight concert pairs during the winter season.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,507 SUN. 221,661
AUG 23 1971

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
AUG 23 1971
New England Newsclip

9,000 persons applaud BSO at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — A final day audience of nearly 9,000 stood and cheered for nine minutes at the end of the 1971 Boston Symphony Orchestra summer season at Tanglewood Sunday.

Conductor Seiji Ozawa led orchestral, choral and solo forces in the season-concluding performance of Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

Attendance for the eight weeks was 217,022, an increase of 14,034 over 1970.

Berlioz Concert Closes Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The eighth and final weekend of the 34th Berkshire Music Festival ended yesterday afternoon with Seiji Ozawa conducting a glamorized performance of Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust."

Participants were the Boston Symphony, Tanglewood Festival Chorus of 140 singers, and 20 members of the choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, and St. James's Church, West Hartford.

Soloists for the Berlioz: Lois Marshall, soprano, Marguerite; John Alexander, tenor, Faust; Ezio Flagello, baritone, Mephistopheles; Saverio Barbieri, bass, Brander.

Weekend attendance was 25,283.

Figures released by the Tanglewood press office yesterday show a total summer attendance of 217,022, as against last summer's 202,988.

This includes 24 regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, eight open rehearsals, Boston Pops-at-Tanglwood, and Tanglewood-on-Parade.

Three Tuesday night "Contemporary Trends" concerts were given this summer, attended by 20,357. Last summer's six such programs attracted 54,419.

Two special features marked yesterday's stirring "Damnation of Faust."

Beautiful Sound

Some of the most beautiful sound of this summer, and those that came before, was heard in the concluding "Chorus of Angels," in which the youngsters from Hartford participated.

Ozawa kept a closed score before him and conducted the entire work from memory, even to phrasing recitatives for the soloists.

His control of complex strands of voices and instruments was complete, even to an Amen in fugue form that he cued down to the minutest detail.

Over and above this superlative exhibition of podium mechanics, Ozawa exposed the full content of Berlioz' blazing, ornate, gripping music.

Only Flagello sang understandable French, but anyone with a sketchy knowledge of the text (vaguely adapted from the Goethe) sensed the words, situations and drama were in close juxtaposition with the music performance.

Orchestra at Best

The orchestra was at its best, and that's a panacea. The chorus was totally involved with its function and so well versed that they rose on cue as if shot out of a cannon. The youngsters were marvelous and sang from memory.

Barrel-chested Flagello with a vibrant, rolling baritone not only sang superbly but virtually lived the sardonic role without having to illustrate the point. Here was the old pro in his element.

Alexander's Faust had a clear tenor that approached dramatic status with little evidence of strain. But he could well have been mistaken for Radames or Lieutenant Pinkerton.

Miss Marshall sang her Marguerite with scholarly emotion, pleasing voice with a deep low range, and little resemblance to the story's heroine.

Barbieri sang resonantly and competently, but would have made a better impression almost anywhere else than on a platform with Flagello.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted Saturday night's concert with Alexis Weissenberg in Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1.

There were too many liabilities to rate the evening as a high standard Tanglewood event.

Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra was

Music Reviews

pickily exact and quite wooden. Form was lucidly traced for those who were keeping track. Tempos of the two allegros were slightly stepped up.

The slight tartness in Carl Nielsen's Fifth Symphony somehow sounded conventional, even after the Bach. Strings produced their melodies in radiant sounds. Workmanship was first class, but still left a tinsel impression about the whole work, especially in the novel use of snare drum.

In some instances, Thomas' generalities led to disunity. Nor was one likely to mistake racket for pomposity. However, it did give Thomas opportunity to use some of his standardized, elaborate gestures.

He used a kind of swimming style to tow the orchestra through the mid-stream allegro. The four-part fugue was clear in voices and unified as a whole.

Weissenberg stormed through the Tchaikovsky Concerto leaving a trail of wrong notes behind him. The more soulful passages were played with apparent affection, singing tone and a good poetic sense.

The pianist alterred some facets of the score to suit his fancy. But it only proved that there's very little palpitating romance to be extracted from pure "schmaltz."

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night
Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor
Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat, Opus 13, No. 1 — J. C. Bach
Symphony No. 5, Opus 50 — Nielsen
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Opus 23 — Tchaikovsky
Sunday Afternoon
Seiji Ozawa, conductor
The Damnation of Faust, Dramatic Legend, Opus 24 — Berlioz
Lois Marshall, soprano
John Alexander, tenor
Ezio Flagello, baritone
Saverio Barbieri, bass
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Boys Chorus from Choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford
St. James's Church, West Hartford

102

E. J. Dias review

Boston Symphony ends festival at Tanglewood

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 72,971

AUG 24 1971

New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its 1971 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood this weekend with three programs — those on Friday night and Sunday afternoon conducted by Seiji Ozawa and that on Saturday night by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Friday night's concert was unusual in that it featured three composers' reactions to Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." These were Prokofiev's "Suite from 'Romeo and Juliet,' " Berlioz's "Love Scene" from the dramatic symphony "Romeo et Juliette," and Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet Overture Fantasy." Surprisingly enough, this did not make for too much of a good thing inasmuch as the styles and approaches of the three composers are distinctly different.

Guest soloist on Friday's program was pianist Garrick Ohlsson, who will perform here later in the season in the Greater New Bedford Concert Series. Ohlsson, a burly, bearded young man of 24, played Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor" — and played it well, with considerable fire when needed, with an appropriately acerbic approach, and with a commendable technique. The work is not my favorite among Prokofiev's piano pieces (it is a bit too dry and cerebral), but Ohlsson had its difficulties obviously well in hand.

For Saturday's concert, conductor Thomas chose J. C. Bach's "Symphony for Double Orchestra in E. Flat," Nielsen's "Symphony No. 5," and Tschaikovsky's "Piano Concert No. 1 in B Flat Minor," with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist.

The "Symphony for Double Orchestra," by the youngest son of the great Bach, proved to be light, ingratiating, and Mozartian in flavor.

As for the Nielsen "Symphony No. 5," this work by the Danish composer who has been "rediscovered" during the last five years, is a musical dramatization of what might be a conflict between good and evil. It abounds in orchestral fireworks, in sudden shifts of mood (now lyrical, now bombastic). Young Thomas conducted the work with considerable passion and with a nice eye for contrasting detail.

In the Tschaikovsky piano concerto, pianist Weisenberg proved, as he often has in the past, that he is one of the most exciting keyboard artists of our time. With a remarkable range of dynamics, with sometimes ear-splitting power, with a digital prowess almost phenomenal, he gave new life to the old warhorse in a display of genuine artistry.

Sunday afternoon's program was deovted entirely to one work, Berlioz's cantata, "The Damnation of Faust," under Ozawa's energetic baton. This is a work with some glorious sound — sometimes romantic and poetic, menacing at others, sonorous frequently. The four soloists — tenor John Alexander, basso Ezio Flagello (both of the Metropolitan Opera), soprano Lois Marshall, and baritone Saverio Barbieri were all in fine vocal form. Moreover, the orchestra played brilliantly under Ozawa's direction. The result was a welcome revival of a seldom-heard work.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525

AUG 24 1971

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

A Faustian Finish to a Tanglewood Summer

By Peter M. Knapp

An eloquent performance of Hector Berlioz' "dramatic legend," "The Damnation of Faust," closed the eight-week Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

The production by the Boston Symphony was conducted by Co-artistic Director Seiji Ozawa, with soloists soprano Lois Marshall (Marguerite), tenor John Alexander (Faust), baritone Ezio Flagello (Mephistopheles,) bass Saverio Barbieri (Brander) and baritone David Cumberland (an earthly voice). An audience of 8,949 attended on a bright summer afternoon.

Ozawa seems to have a particular affinity for Berlioz — his unique sound, and his languid and demonic elements. He ended last year's Tanglewood series with a resplendent "Requiem" and was cheered earlier for the "Symphonie Fantastique." Some listeners overheard at intermission recalled Charles Munch's mastery and thought Ozawa lacked the Alsatian's instinct for the music; others were more enthusiastic — "He makes me enjoy the music," one gushed. Most seemed to find it altogether splendid, and the end of each section was well applauded.

Unfamiliar

The reaction is interesting, for this version of the "Faust" legend, except for certain excerpts which find their way into the concert hall, is not all that well known. The work is not a comprehensive treatment of Goethe's poem, rather a series of compressed dramatic episodes prepared by Berlioz and the French writers Gerard and Gandonniere after a French translation of Goethe. Its four main sections and 20 scenes present the dramatic highlights of the story — the twist being Faust's damnation rather than his redemption.

Berlioz has endowed this work with numerous exquisite details and theatrical effects. The composer's brilliance of orchestration (incredible woodwind effects) are on full display, and he is less pompous and long-winded than in a number of other works. The score furthermore contains several formally structured pieces (march, fugue, ballad, strophic song), a good deal of skillful counterpoint, and deft transitions.

Ozawa's leadership was over-all compelling, vivid in detail and exciting in the big moments. He provided buoyant backgrounds for his soloists, ethereal playing for the dance music of the sylphs and will-o'-the wisps, and evoked sleek playing from the BSO musicians. The woodwinds were especially dazzling. The Rakoczy March made a big effect — though it went at quite a gallop and some phrase endings were not always well defined — as did the Ride to Hell.

Feminine Shaping

The principal soloists sang with dramatic conviction and praiseworthy French diction. Miss Marshall fused word and note into shapely phrases with her warmly feminine voice, and her singing of "D'amour l'ardente flamme" was especially moving despite a few dubious pitches. Alexander was in glowingly fine lyric voice, and the dark-voiced Flagello showed his scrupulous attention to detail and rhythm and ability to make pointed inflections. Cumberland sang the "earthly voice" strongly, but Barbieri's rendition of Brander's "Song of the Rat" didn't carry very well.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, sang with distinction — not least for their brisk, airy attacks in the lighter choruses. They were joined in the Epilogue by boy choristers from Christ Church Cathedral in Hartford, and St. James's Church in West Hartford.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's associate conductor, led Saturday night's program, attended by 7,158. Rumbles of thunder greeted Thomas as he stepped to the podium for Johann Christian Bach's Symphony for Double Orchestra in E-flat, Opus 18, No. 1; Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 5, and Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in b-flat minor, for which Alexis Weissenberg was soloist.

The spunky Bach symphony provided a spirited overture for the weightier fare. For divided orchestras of winds and strings, playing in unisons or antiphonally, the work is one of the set of six published in London about 1781 (No. 4 of the group was performed on this season's opening night at Tanglewood). The opening theme is so close to that of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony (coming a year later) that one wonders whether it is coincidence, or who borrowed from whom. Whatever, the piece was neatly done at flying tempi, with crisp attacks and superb balances.

Changed Atmosphere

After this charming introduction, a move into the menacing and unsettling world of Nielsen's 1922 symphony, a work which reflects the uncertainties of the post-World War I years. One can easily think, during this original and expressive symphony, of the "war music" of Prokofiev and Shostakovitch, and indeed some passages in the first of the two movements share a kinship with the latter.

If J. C. Bach's orchestra is physically divided, Nielsen's music is in conflict with itself. One can assign all kinds of philosophical or programmatic interpretations to this struggle between the serene and hopeful and the anti-world of percussion and brass which intrudes, fragments and threatens to destroy it. It is a powerful and dramatic work by the Danish composer, who died nine years later in 1931.

The performance was stunning — big, tough and under masterly control. Thomas had a firm grasp of the score — the kind of music in which he has been having spectacular success — and the orchestra playing was vivid and vibrant.

It was less so in the too-familiar Tchaikowsky concerto, which came off unevenly despite a number of admirable details. Though the string sound had that BSO-Russe glow, the wind intonation faltered and much of the performance seemed unable to burst loose and soar. The tempo of the second movement, for example, was too slow for comfort and made the melodic line hard to sustain.

PIANIST ALEXIS WEISSENBERG—extraordinary technician

Weissenberg is an extraordinary technician whose impassive presence at the keyboard is a remarkable contrast to what his fingers are doing. His technique is all finger-and-wrist work, with little forearm or shoulder motion (except, of course, in the dazzling hammered octaves of this concerto), and how he generates such sonority from hands held so closely to the keys is a physical wonder.

Weissenberg is capable of astonishing effects, original approaches and luminous phrasing. Yet he also is given to impetuosity that strains musical lines and tumbles notes out so rapidly that the ear cannot register them in sequence and the rhythm is broken.

The Bulgarian-born pianist's recital for Friday night's weekend prelude, on the other hand, was a brilliant display of pianism — virtuosic yet marvellously ordered, and hitting its peak in a spectacularly colored and subtle performance of Schumann's Symphonic Etudes.

For Friday night's program, attended by 6,191, Ozawa chose a program built around the Romeo and Juliet theme. There were the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet' overture-fantasy, the Pfokofiev ballet suite, and the Love Scene from the dramatic symphony of Berlioz. Also on the program was Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 2 in g minor, with Garrick Ohlsson as soloist.

All that was lacking for this musical tryst was romantic weather, which turned out to be better suited for, say, "The Flying Dutchman" or something having to do with mists and elves. But while the weather was squishy, most of the playing was not, though the sound of course showed some effects of the dampness.

It was an attractive program demonstrating different musical visions of the same theme — lyric-dramatic scores by master orchestrators. It is familiar repertoire for the Boston Symphony, and gave Ozawa an opportunity to show his flair for drama and ardent intensity, though there were some rhythmic displacements and moments of problematic coordination in the Prokofiev suite. The lovely Berlioz went particularly well.

The Prokofiev concerto fit into this scheme since it, too, is predominantly lyrical though it encompasses a wide (overly wide, in fact) range of styles and effects. It is a youthful work, written by Prokofiev at the age of 22 and welcomed by a critical uproar at the time. Today, it is on the fringes of the repertoire, not for its ultra-boldness, but for its patchy, stringy quality.

The score darts from lyrical soliloquies wreathed in chromatics to gaunt, leaping chords and octaves, from the reflective to the grotesque. The "Intermezzo" movement opens with a heavy brass tread akin to the "Montagues and the Capulets" section of the "Romeo" ballet suite, then turns playful and eventually, bizarre and slithery.

The finale is a cornucopia of effects; the scherzo, a continual toccata-like scamper for the soloist. Throughout, there is much characteristically Prokofiev in the piquant and colorful harmonies, angularity of line, and mordant wit.

Best Policy

Ohlsson's performance was impressive — honest, rhythmically sure and sensitive in this pianistically challenging work. The pianist, making his debut with the Boston Symphony, is a 24-year-old New Yorker who had won the Chopin Competition in Warsaw. He is a bearded giant of a man with huge hands who makes a Steinway grand look like a baby grand, and next to him, conductor Ozawa looks like a schoolboy at the Green Bay Packers' training camp.

Tanglewood In Review

Lest emotions and exuberance tend toward over-indulgence in superlative this has purposely waited for a final analysis of Tanglewood's final concert week-end for this season. In the briefest of assertions all might be said in three words—THIS was MUSIC!!

Instead of the oft-repeated and inimitable and great Ninth Symphony of Beethoven the entire Sunday concert which wound up a momentous season was the Damnation of Faust by Hector Berlioz. There are no superlatives too great for this production—the performance of it is demanding indeed and it matched this masterful composition. This is music in its truest sense and the combined of beautiful orchestration solo and choral interplay of the rugged score evoked an applause that seemed would never end. One is breathless with ecstatic emotion and elated with a new sense of joy, and sheer gratitude for ears that can hear and love such beauty of transcending sound.

It was a tremendous performance throughout and seemingly perfect balance. The mighty chorus consisted of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Choir boys from Christ Church Cathedral Hartford and St. Jame's Church West Hartford. John Oliver Raymond Glover and Jame Taylor, conductors respectively (joined in the final curtain calls). Soloists were Lois Marshall, soprano as Marguerite John Alexander, tenor, Faust Ezio Flagello, baritone, Mephistopheles and Baverio Barbie. bass as Brander and Davis Dumberland an earthly voice.

They could not have been more fittingly chosen. The program notes added to the complete enjoyment in following the story. In summation, fireworks can hardly have greater display of brilliance and glory. Ozowa orchestral conductor was at his best: Saturday evenings concert offered Carl Nielson's Fifth Symphony, John Christian Bach's Symphony for double orchestra in E flat both of these in their first performance at the Berkshire festival and a performance of the Piano concerto No. 1 in B flat by Tchaikovsky with Alexis Weissenberg, as soloist.

From the melodies lines of Bach to Nielson was quite a jump in type but a marvelous study in contrast.

Of all his music Berlioz himself is quoted as having loved his love scene from Romeo and Juliet best. Perhaps there is no favorite Berlioz and though this Faust may have seemed at the time the most wonderful of music of all time the same perhaps would have been true had I heard the Friday evening concert's overture of Berlioz' own choice.

Considered one of the four most remarkable re-discoveries of the past few decades is Carl Nielsen. Danish composer who is coming more and more to the fore, and his Fifth Symphony is considered a perfect example of his symphonic art at its best. No longer unknown, he stands in the stature of his Scadinavian giant Sibelius. Peace against war, good against evil, conflict against society—the drums or the quiet flute—and out of the ashes of human hostility Nielson proclaims a "yes man shall prevail". In the language of music—this is a tremendous statement, tremendously rendered. Replete with sombre sojourns into the deep emotional realms and majestic thoughts therefore stirring and elevating and the orchestra as usual met the challenge.

Alexis Weissenberg is a great technician and a great artist. Tchaikovsky demands a terrific travel over the keyboard and judging by the audience reactions who thundered approbation in applause he performed to their mutual delight as he did mine.

And so as the theme goes—another season of "the song has ended but the melody lingers on. . ." and over the summer crowded lawn and shed and classroom comes the hush of the autumn paint brush the quiet white of winter and then again the rush of spring into summer and (DV) another season at Tanglewood. So, music lovers, till then gather your stereo tapes and albums, light your fire, attend the local symphony, and concerts that abound in the area and it won't be so very long.

R. E. HOUGHTON

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000

AUG 26 1971

New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Ozawa, Thomas lead as Tanglewood ends

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

The 34th Berkshire Festival came to an end here on Sunday afternoon with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony in as opulent a performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" as the rich green, sun-drenched surroundings in which it took place. There were 8,949 persons in and around the Shed, bringing the summer's total to 217,022 (14,000 or so more than last year).

The previous evening, Michael Tilson Thomas had ended his program with another towering 19th-century romantic work, the B-flat minor Piano Concerto (No. 1) of Tchaikovsky, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist in a controversial interpretation. More than 7,000 hardy listeners braved uncertain weather for this occasion.

In a period where Berlioz has emerged from the protective shadows of the cultists to wide acceptance in performance, another look at and listen to "The Damnation" is overdue. Anyone who happened to see it done at the Paris Opéra as World War II was ending, with projections and other advanced (for then) multimedia accouterments, has long since realized what possibilities its abstract plot line offers the stage director and designer. And what a wealth of tonal brilliance is present as background in the score for those brief, jewel-like flashes that characterize Faust, Mephistopheles, and Marguerite in scenes of contemplation, bravado, and pathos.

Mr. Ozawa embraced the work, very much as he had last summer's concluding Berlioz Mass, shaping it dramatically and balancing its large choral and instrumental sections with searching glimpses of the protagonists, each of whom is allotted moments of solo glory. Rhythmically everything moved with an inevitable rightness, and the transparency of texture, when it was called for, revealed wonders of instrumental and vocal craftsmanship that belong to Berlioz alone.

As soloists there were John Alexander (Faust), Ezio Flagello (Mephistopheles), Lois Marshall (Marguerite), Saverio Barbieri (Brander), and David Cumberland (an Earthly Voice), who along with the remarkable Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and the appealing boys choruses from Christ Church Cathedral and St. James's Church in Connecticut showed their consistently solid musicianship.

While Mr. Alexander's refined tenor is equal to more than most demands in his range, it doesn't dominate the Berlioz "légende dramatique" as much as perhaps it should, with a ringing quality that indeed reflects the romantic spirit of the composer himself. Mr. Flagello's Mephisto was more subtle, but always in the frame, and Miss Marshall, a soprano singing a part with strong mezzo overtones, achieved a particular emotional response from the sad, warmly defined figure of Berlioz's Marguerite. Mr. Barbieri and Mr. Cumberland were effective in their brief but prominent contributions.

The large audience was obviously caught in the spell of this dazzling score, as they had been when Charles Munch last conducted it at Tanglewood. Mr. Ozawa's performance with these forces was a worthy successor, and a strong finale for the BSO's country stay.

Thomas in charge

On Saturday evening, Mr. Thomas repeated two works which he had conducted in Boston during the past season, but which had never been done previously at Tanglewood — the Johann Christian Bach Symphony for Double Orchestra in E flat (Op. 18, No. 1), and the Fifth Symphony of Carl Nielsen.

The Bach, into which Mr. Thomas launched with gusto after deference to a downbeat thunderclap, proved to be delightful outdoor music which cut through the humidity with its own kind of built-in air-conditioning. The twin orchestras played it crisply, and the conductor allowed none of its humor and vigor to bow to the heat.

The Nielsen Symphony also provides a strong gust of fresh air, not only because of its freshness as a burgeoning repertory piece but through its strength of instrumental statement and strong tonal appeal. The first of the two movements particularly offers some exciting listening during what is practically a percussion concerto — expertly accomplished by Arthur Press—and along with the somber color and sonority, there were frequent opportunities for the well-remembered BSO sound.

The choice of the Tchaikovsky First Concerto was a strange one for Mr. Weissenberg unless perhaps he is hoping not to be typed as an exponent of the more recent sizzling type of composition in which he excels (like last winter's Bartok in Boston). It would seem that the wiry strength of his technique and the runaway agility of his fingers would be as opposite to the roundness and melodic flow of Tchaikovsky as Giacometti to Rodin.

So it proved to be. Mr. Weissenberg certainly navigated the keyboard, and played the notes, but it was an interpretation which, except for being his own, did little for the music as written except pull it out of shape (the Andante was incredibly slow). It looks and sounds inappropriate to claw at this concerto, although if bursts of rhythmic exercise and exhibitions of dazzling facility are one's major considerations, this kind of performance is an audience rouser. Saturday's audience was indeed enthused and brought the pianist and the conductor back numerous times.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood: Ozawa's 'Faust'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The 1971 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood finished Sunday afternoon with a performance conducted by Seiji Ozawa of Berlioz's dramatic legend, "The Damnation of Faust." Berlioz first had a go at Goethe's "Faust" in 1828 when he was 24 and Gothe, still alive, 79. A few years later, though the withdrew those "eight scenes from Faust," his opus one, and returned to the material only in 1845, his experience as a musician enlarged particularly by his profound and original treatment of Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet."

He was now equipped to deal not only with the lyric and coloristic elements that had dominated the "eight scenes," but also with Mephistophelean irony, with the pain behind Faust's aspirations, and with the abyss of Faust's and Marguerite's love for each other.

"The Damnation of Faust" is still apt to disturb, rejected by most Germans on principle and unloved by many others who long for the melifluous Gounod. Less cohesive than "Romeo and Juliet," "The Damnation of Faust" is nonetheless a masterpiece, and an extremely idiosyncratic one, to be sure. When Berlioz tackled "Faust" for the second time, he dealt with Goethe almost as possessively and ruthlessly as Goethe himself had dealt with the legend before him. Berlioz could not possibly accommodate all the dimensions of the play, and so he took what he most responded to, informing his view of Goethe with a musical fantasy that I find staggering and a nobility and compassion by which I am very much moved. His Goethe composition is as triumphantly self-justifying as his later, still more outrageously bold embrace of Virgil in "The Trojans."

How the large audience Sunday really responded I cannot quite say. The applause was enthusiastic, but there seemed to be more restlessness than usual, which I incline to attribute to the inadequacy of a plot summary where a full libretto really is needed. I understand why it was thought impossible to print so long a text in the program; just the same, might it not be possible on some future occasion to persuade some advertiser each with new acknowledgment to sponsor, as it were, a page or a half-page of text?

The performance I would describe as marvelous with some great flaws. What made it marvelous was Ozawa's fluid pacing, sensitive phrasing, general manner of delivery, and the extension of all that in the Boston Symphony's beautiful playing. This is all rare and remarkable defined in a performance in a major work of Berlioz. These qualities, particularly the ones to do with pacing and timing, were also wonderfully present Friday evening when Ozawa conducted the love scene from "Romeo and Juliet," a breathtakingly insightful penetration into that music, marred only by a sound that was too open and, to say bluntly, often too loud.

But it was Ozawa too, who was responsible for the most disturbing flaw of the "Faust" performance, the series of cuts. One, that of the music as Faust walks about Marguerite's room, examining it "with passionate curiosity," dropped one of Berlioz's most telling touches of psychologically right detail, and those in the finale of Part III and in the pandemonium scene, badly distorted the form.

John Alexander sang Faust, and did it admirably except for the careless French he shared with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Lois Marchall unsteadiness of voice in the high register detracted slightly from her intelligent and intense performance as Marguerite. Ezio Flagello, the Mephistopheles, was good in a part that could do with a voice that is less sumptuous but which offers more of a cutting edge. Saverio Barbieri as Brander, who gets the sadistic Song of the Rat, did not come through sufficiently, but there was fine singing by David Cumberland as an Earthly Voice and D'anna Fortunato as a heavenly one.

Other than linguistically, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus did its work very well, but the meagre dozen and a half boys from the Hartford Cathedral and from St. James', West Hartford, were far too few not just for Berlioz's "some thirty" (to say nothing of his hopeful two or three hundred), but too few really, to add that last touch of angelic radiance to the apotheosis.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Last Tanglewood Weekend

Tanglewood
Aug. 20
By J.H.

Compassion for two tragic young lovers, three poignant musical allusions to their story, and beautiful playing under sensitive direction infused Friday night's concert with an intense emotional quality rarely achieved in the shed.

Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet is a stunning work by a mature genius. Economically written, brilliantly orchestrated, the pieces demand a broad range of texture and color from the performers. Conductor Seiji Ozawa extracted a special measure of response from the Boston Symphony in this performance. The energetic lyricism by the strings in the feud, the gay line-tossing in the dances, the overwhelming passion in the tomb sequence were supercharged with enlightened musicality.

In a respite from tragic love, young pianist Garrick Ohlsson brought the proper spirit to Prokofiev's Piano Concerto no. 2 in G minor. The work is that of a young genius breaking new musical ground but with an ever-present ear for the virtuoso performance, and, as a whole, is rather thin.

Two more Romeo and Juliet episodes, the love scene by Berlioz — tender, lyrical, with dramatic moments of pain and foreboding — and Tchaikovsky's Overture-fantasy — a finely crafted dramatic piece — were given the same thoughtful performances as the Prokofiev.

Tanglewood, Aug. 21
By F.G.C.

One of the more refreshing things about Michael Tilson Thomas is his dedication to unhackneyed, innovative programming.

The first two works on the program — the Johann Christian Bach Symphony for Double Orchestra and the Carl Nielsen Fifth Symphony — received first performances. These readings were characterized by the stylistic accuracy and great attention to detail we have come to associate with this brilliant young conductor's work. The Bach was a masterpiece of elegant restraint; the Nielsen was full of drama and fireworks.

Given more standard fare, however, things deteriorated rapidly. Maturity, we trust, will bring Thomas more skill as an accompanist; the Tchaikovsky First Piano Concerto was frankly a disappointment. The conductor seemed completely insensitive to pianist Alexis Weissenberg's expansive, dramatic playing, and there were awkward entrances from the orchestra throughout the work.

While Weissenberg's quiet, lyrical sections were exquisite, and his solo-cadenza playing was thrilling, his bravura passages seemed sloppy and overpedalled. We hope to hear these two performers again under more favorable circumstances.

Tanglewood
Aug. 22
By M.K.B.

On Sunday, Aug. 22, the 1971 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood came to a climactic end with the magnificent performance of Berlioz' La Damnation de Faust, Legende Dramatique.

The work is in four parts and requires a large orchestra with a small brass band playing off stage at times, a large chorus, five soloists and a boys' chorus.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus did an excellent job on the demanding chorus part. The part of Faust was sung by John Alexander, tenor, and the part of Mephistopheles was sung by Ezio Flagello, baritone. These two poured forth with all their might and gave stunning performances.

The part of Marguerite was sung by Lois Marshall, soprano, and the part of Brander by Saverio Barbieri, bass. David Cumberland sang the part of An Earthly Voice beautifully.

The boys' chorus was from the choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, and St. James' Church, West Hartford. They quietly entered the already full stage during the last few minutes of the performance and added a special quality to the end of a marvelous piece of music — so perfect for the wide open spaces and beauty of the Tanglewood setting and the close of the summer season.

Seiji Ozawa conducted this final performance with a great deal of inspiration and understanding of the score. In fact, he appeared not even to use the score throughout the entire performance. The audience response at the end was most enthusiastic and appreciative of this performance and the entire season.

104

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 210,540

AUG 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Berlioz's 'Faust' Ends Tanglewood

By HARRY NEVILLE

LENOX—The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood ended Sunday afternoon with a performance of Berlioz's dramatic legend, "The Damnation of Faust." The final event of the season here is traditionally a grand affair that involves most of Tanglewood's musical resources, and on this occasion the performing forces included the Boston Symphony, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, a boys chorus recruited from Hartford, and five vocal soloists.

IN CHARGE of this impressive array was conductor Seiji Ozawa, and he gave a reading that provided further evidence of the thoughtfulness and musical integrity that now characterize the work of this once quite dashing maestro. "Faust" is a work that can yield handsome dividends when played in a swashbuckling, no-holds-barred fashion, but Ozawa chose instead an approach that sought to place every detail in an utterly logical musical context.

It was a performance that elucidated dimensions of the work that are usually overlooked or lost in the hands of more frenetic conductors. How pleasant it was, for example, to hear the "Rakoczy March" and the "Ride to the Abyss" played with such rhythmic clarity and attentiveness to orchestral balance and the progressive unfolding of dynamic levels.

ONE MISSED, perhaps, the sheer exhilaration of a less coolly calculated performance but one probably heard more of what the fastidious Berlioz really intended.

If there were shortcomings and disappointments, these were not attributable to Ozawa, whose mastery of the score was evident at every moment. More rehearsal time would have helped him to realize his intentions, and I suppose, too, that he was handicapped by a last-day-of-school attitude on the part of some of the players. Brass intonation, for example, was shockingly bad, and there were several instances of slipshod ensemble work and poor articulation.

NONE OF THE principal vocalists—tenor John Alexander (Faust), soprano Lois Marshall (Marguerite), baritone Ezio Flagello (Mephistopheles)—did much with the dramatic potentialities of their parts. Alexander, however, achieved some exquisite bel canto effects and sang with commendable French diction.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Concert Review

Final Weekend Of Berkshire Festival At Tanglewood

By Martha deB. Beaver

The final weekend of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox closed Sunday afternoon with prolonged and enthusiastic acclaim for an at times brilliant performance of Berlioz' Damnation of Faust directed by Seiji Ozawa, who revealed searching study of this magnificent work, conducted without a score.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, trained by John Olver, was joined in the dramatic evocation by soloists Lois Marshall, soprano, as Marguerite, tenor John Alexander as Faust, baritone Ezio El Flagello, Mephistopheles, bass Saverio Barieri as Brander, David Cumberland, an earthly voice. The angelic boys chorus for the final scene came from the choirs of Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, Conn., directed by Raymond F. Glover, and St. James Church, West Hartford, directed by James R. Taylor.

Ozawa controlled his forces nobly and empathic response from the chorus indicated fine training by John Olver, but not enough rehearsals for control of sound, which often overshadowed the soloists, especially Barbieri's purely-toned but non-penetrating voice in his "Song of the Rat", in Part Two.

Alexander's articulation was perfection, his solos that followed the violas in subjective sadness and opening of the superb work second part, where his mood changes to tender retrospection, musically and dramatically conceived.

Superb too was the Hosanna of the second section, its simple melody intoned by the flute and oboe, then the male chorus, and the structural clarity of that fugued Amen completely enchanting. Flagello's Sond of the Flea displayed his magnificent artistry, and later an unmatched resonance, though his verbal articulation didn't equal that of Alexander's.

Where does one stop in describing the effect and performance of his inspired work, full of dramatic orchestral and vocal contrast, stresses and rhythms, melodic and harmonic counterpoint? It is interesting to recall not that he started conjecturing her verses in 1846 while rolling along in a post-chaise, beginning with Faust's invocation to nature, using Goethe only as inspiration, transporting the hero to Hungary because he wanted to include his just-completed and popularly received Hungarian March. Somehow this and the familiar Will O' the Wisps (third section) bring a touch of worldly assurance to the mounting intricasies of an otherwise introspective and other-world drama.

Friday night's prelude brought pianist Alexis Weissenberg in a musically evocative performance of the seldom heard Franck-Bauer Prelude, fugue and variation Op. 18, and Symphonic Schumann's Etudes.

Ozawa displayed an evolving understanding of the beautifully contrasted Romeo and Juliet works by Prokofieff, Berlioz, Tchaikovsky. There is certainly much of the terpischore in this conductor's style, but also an increasing seriousness in dedication to his musical responsibilities, now, one assumes, that he is maturing in understanding and artisitc scope.

Garrick Ohlsson appeared for the first time at Tanglewood in Prokofiev's second piano concerto, also seldom heard, a pianist's tour de force, rich and dissonant, arranged in modern Brahmsian fashion, which Ohlssen displayed with excitement and technical virtuosity. The non-stop 16th notes of Scherzo were breathtaking. Ozawa coordinated orchestra and soloist I excellently, unlike Michael Tilson Thomas with Weissenberg and the musicians in Tchaikovsky's first Saturday evening. We don't know why this tired work, heard at the Pops concert was substituted for the scheduled Ravel concerto which would have proved much more interesting.

The 24-year old pianist Ohlsson is 6-foot 4 inches, towering over the diminutive Ozawa, but according to this reviewer's father, less tall than the composer himself, seen and by him heard in his first piano sonata many years ago, in New York City which was not received well, although his Classical Symphony was an instant success. Obvious too is Prokofiev's study of Berlioz' orchestration. Until the latter's time, the orchestra comprised the small chamber group extant since Mozart, which Berlioz increased, adding a variety of instruments and thus more textural and tonal possibilities for the composer.

Saturday's program conducted with varying degrees of musically interpretive proficiency by Michael Tilson Thomas began with a deceptively simple Symphony in E-flat for double orchestra by Johann Christian Bach, evoking the charm of 18th century London, and a pleasing contrast to the following fruitful fifth symphony by the Danish composer Carl Nielsen.

In two highly contrasting movements, the second with suggestions of Gershwin and Brahms, the composer's idea of a dramatic struggle between the forces of good and evil didn't quite come across, although his use of powerful clashing tonalties and dissonant intervals against evocation peaceful themes served to intrigue the listener's interest, which had little opportunity to relax.

Winds, brass, and percussion instruments were superb, the strings as always tonally and resonantly secure in a galaxy of kaleidascopic color. We think the orchestra may have used up their usual strong reserve with this work, saving little for the concluding Tscahikovsky piano concerto. There was little wrong with Weissenberg's technique, and his beginning chords carving promised greatness to come, but never achieved.

There was a strong feeling of tension between conductor and soloist as to tempi and interpretation, which made each independent solo and cadenza most welcome. The audience, as always, responded with vociferous enthusiasm.

STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

AUG 29 1971 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

I spent last weekend in Lenox in order to hear the final three programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. The air in the Berkshires was clean and crisp, the music pleasant. Two young conductors, Seiji Ozawa, currently music director of the San Francisco Symphony, and Michael Tilson Thomas, associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony and newly appointed director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, were on the Tanglewood podium — Ozawa for the concerts on Friday night and Sunday afternoon, and Thomas for the Saturday night program.

Perhaps the highlight of the weekend was the performance of Berlioz's dramatic cantata (sometimes done as an opera), "The Damnation of Faust," which includes scenes suggested by Gerard de Nerval's French translation of Goethe's "Faust," but which is more Berlioz than anything else. Often in the concert hall we hear selections from the work — the famous "Hungarian March," "Ballet of the Sylphs," the chorus of angels welcoming Marguerite into their celestial company. However, to hear the work as a whole can lead to nothing but admiration for Berlioz's genius. There is some glorious sound, there are alternating moods of lyricism and shattering power, there is an effective ending that tugs at the emotions.

Ozawa conducted the work with sensitivity and his customary elan. His soloists were first-rate — tenor John Alexander as Faust, Ezio Flagello as the menacing Mephistopholes, Lois Marshall as Marguerite, Saverio Barbieri as Brander, and the beautifully trained Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

The weekend also provided an opportunity to hear two distinguished pianists — on Friday night, the bearded and burly Garrick Ohlsson in pearformance of Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor," and on Saturday night, Alexis Weissenberg in Tschaikovsky's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor." I was eager to hear young Ohlsson because later in the season he will present a recital here in the Greater New Bedford Concert Series. Of course, one cannot judge a pianist wholly on his performance of just one work. However, in the Prokofiev, Ohlsson did maintain an appropriately acerbic approach, gave a display of considerable keyboard virtuosity, and managed to perform with both power and precision.

As for Weissenberg, who is unquestionably one of the top keyboard artists of our day, he managed the impossible — that is, he injected new life into the old Tschaikovsy warhorse, accomplishing this miracle with an amazing range of dynamics, with runs and trills remarkable for their articulation, with a superb blend of poetry and power. Weissenberg also offered on Friday night a one-hour Prelude recital, in which he performed Schumann's 'E'tudes Symphoniques," the Franck-Bauer "Prelude, Fugue, et Variation," and encores by Chopin and Liszt. Again, he was impeccable both in technique and interpretation.

The Boston Symphony players now take a brief and well-earned vacation before opening their 91st season at Symphony Hall on September 24.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 24 1971

Tanglewood Shed's Finale Outstanding

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

The final summer concert in the Shed at Tanglewood was the performance of Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust."

Seiji Ozawa led the combined forces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, a Boy's Choir from Hartford Connecticut, and soloists in this vivid and dramatic work period.

BERLIOZ IS without question one of the great geniuses of composition in musical forms of this dimension and concept. His "Requiem," "Romeo and Juliet," "The Damnation of Faust" and particularly "Les Troyens" are staggering achievements not only in terms of the size and mass of the voices and instruments involved, but in the rare ability to keep all these enormous factors quite within the great sweeping concepts of his ambition and text. In this sense, his gift was probably unique.

Mahler, with his "crucifiction Symphony," Boito with the prologue to "Mephistopheles" and Verdi's "Requiem" all tried works of much the same scope, and probably the only one who came close was Verdi.

THE SOLOISTS were Lois Marshall, soprano, John Alexander, tenor, Ezio Flagello, bass, and Saverio Barbieri, baritone.

The solo sork is extremely demanding particularly for "Mephistopheles." sung by Flagello. Both Aexander and Flagello were impressive, particularly the latter who was billed as a baritone, which he is not.

His great rich voice roared and swept through the music, exhibiting absolutely no dereliction of either range or quality. His delineation of this role both vocally and musically was easily the best I have heard since Ezio Pinza did it in 1943 with the New York Philharmonic under Toscaninni. And that is about as complete a critical remark of which I am capable.

ALEXANDER WAS likewise in command throughout, with no strictures of range and a sure dramatic understanding of Faust's classic and ambiguous dilemma.

Lois Marshall, who tours with the Bach Aria Group has always been difficult for me to assess. Musucally she is more than adequate, but she continually gives an impression of effort if not crisis.

The chorus was very effective indeed but Ozawa could take a page from the book of Colin Dvais in how he balances the soloists, the chorus and the orchestra when they all declaiming full bore.

THE ORCHESTRA often overwhelming the other two when a little more restraint would have brought it all into focus. The Boys' Choir in the finale could not be heard from my seat on the left front.

There was a virtual demonstration at the end. Ozawa is rapidly establishing a personality cult much of which is deserved. He is very sure and effective with the orchestra, but when balancing the several major forces he was less so. The off-stage brass in the few instances they were used were tentative and slightly out of meter.

106

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER '71

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 260,961

JUN 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Opening concert at Tanglewood

The 31st opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center will be held in the Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood, next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. More than 400 students of the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music will mark the beginning of the Tanglewood season by performing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," commissioned by Serge Koussevitzky for the opening ceremonies in 1940. The public is invited to the event and to the reception afterwards in the formal gardens.

The initial concert of the Berkshire Festival will take place in the shed Frdiay, July 2, at 9 p.m., when Seiji Ozawa conducts the BSO in works of Johann Christian and Johann Sebastian Bach. The featured work will be the latter's "Magnificat," with soloists Carole Bogard, soprano; Rose Taylor, alto; John McCollum, tenor; David Clatworthy, bass; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

The weekend "Prelude" concert, Friday at 7 p.m. in the shed, will feature Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola d'amore; Jules Eskin, cello; and Robert Levin, harpsichord, in works of Stamitz and J.S. Bach. The event is free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Seiji will again conduct the orchestra Saturday, July 3, at 8:30 p.m., when violinist Joseph Silverstein and flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer will appear as soloists in a program of works by Mozart, Bernstein, Berio and Tchaikovsky. Michael Tilson Thomas will be the conductor Sunday at 2:30 p.m. His program will include Vivaldi's "The Seasons" and selections from Monteverdi's "Vespro della Beata Vergine."

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977

JUN 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Summer Academy Draws 300 to Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Nearly 300 students from 17 countries and 28 states received a lot of sound advice and encouragement yesterday afternoon at the 32nd annual opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center.

This is the Boston Symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood for advanced music study.

Main speakers were Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, two of three Tanglewood artistic directors. The third, Leonard Bernstein, sent greetings from California.

Boston Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry established a compatible relationship with the young people in his introductory remarks.

"While you are here," he said, "we will be learning and gaining much more from you than we will be giving."

Lucid Counsel

Although Ozawa apologized for his imperfect English, the young Japanese conductor improvised lucid counsel that earned him tremendous student reaction.

"Everything you do here during the eight weeks will be a test of the Center and what it stands for," he said.

"Eleven years ago, I was seated where you are. I have since learned that everything in music becomes more difficult. But you always discover things that are more and more fantastic.

Solfeggio Missing

"Music demands so much technique that hard work must be done every day for years. You must improve your mind, heart and hand.

"What is most missing in American music education is solfeggio — recognition and production of tones," he stressed. "If you don't get enough of it here, you must improve yourselves."

Schuller said not a word about the severe material hardships of musical institutions, like the New England Conservatory of which he is president.

As a prominent composer, it came as no surprise that he devoted most of his time to championing contemporary music.

"Tanglewood represents a totality of combined experiences," he said. "Don't cling to preconceived notions. Let the place wash over you."

Schuller described even the most advanced techniques in present-day music as the continuation of the unbroken development since the Middle Ages.

"We're in a unique period," he stated. "It evolves most noticeably from shocking developments of 50 or 60 years ago. Faith and patience are necessary ingredients for remaining young."

This could be interpreted as advance defense of the Center's annual contemporary music that will be held during the second week in August, co-sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

One Blight

With only one rehearsal, earlier in the day, the students gave a glowing performance of Randall Thompson's unaccompanied "Alleluia," conducted by John Oliver of the Center faculty.

The occasion's one blight was connected to Roman Totenberg's appearance in Bach's unaccompanied G minor Sonata for violin.

When he came on stage, the violinist was accorded the usual applause with which most performers are greeted.

A German shepherd added his voice to which Totenberg showed his annoyance.

The seeing-eye dog and its owner, a young woman student at the Center, hastily removed themselves.

Totenberg's lags in tempo to accomodate technique and spotty note-playing didn't seem to justify the degree of undisturbed listening that he apparently expected.

In his greetings from the Council of Tanglewood Friends, financial contributors to the Center, Curtis Buttenhiem advised the students that they would receive every cooperation from local citizens, including pianos for practice.

The outburst of reaction was such that it's likely Berkshire County piano tuners will be kept extremely busy during the next eight weeks.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

JUN 27 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Special interest is directed at comments this afternoon by Gunther Schuller at the opening of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy in Lenox for advance music study.

Schuller and Seiji Ozawa are artistic directors at Tanglewood, with Leonard Bernstein as advisor.

Some 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and foreign countries will study at the Center during this summer's intensive eight-week session ending August 22.

The Tanglewood operation accounts for more than 40 per cent of the Boston Symphony's annual deficit.

Recently, the Charles E. Merrill Trust announced a grant of $35,000 to the Berkshire Center.

This grant now places the Boston Symphony's 90th Anniversary Fund near the $2 million level. The orchestra is currently conducting a fund campaign to raise $6 million.

When this amount is raised and added to the $4 million subscribed to match the Ford Challenge Grant of $2 million, the Boston Symphony will have investment income sufficient to cover a large part of its annual operating deficit.

Schuller is also president of The New England Conservatory which has been conducting a valiant drive this past year to raise enough money to keep its doors open.

Orchestras, opera companies, schools of music, and the concert stage have been functioning under stringent financial problems.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

It will be interesting to learn what encouragement Schuller has to offer the 425 young musicians whose financial investment, academic effort and personal sacrifice are made in the hope of earning a living through some form of musical employment.

BERKSHIRE Music Festival by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood begins at 9 p.m., Friday, July 2.

The music season in the Berkshires began yesterday afternoon at the opening of the South Mountain Concerts in Pittsfield.

Prague Madrigal Singers and Instrumentalists, 18 performers from Czechoslovakia, appeared yesterday at South Mountain on their first American tour.

Berkshire Boy Choir, an ensemble of 60 voices, will be heard Saturday afternoon (all programs at 3 p.m.), July 31. Vermeer String Quartet, recently organized by Rudolf Serkin at Marlboro, Vt., will make their South Mountain debut, Aug. 21.

New Cleveland String Quartet, also affiliated with Marlboro, will play Sept. 12. Closing concert will be given by the Beaux Arts Trio of New York, Oct. 3.

South Mountain concerts had to be abandoned last summer because of extensive damage to the concert hall. Only the most urgent repairs were made so that the season could begin yesterday afternoon.

ALTHOUGH much is written about the music presented at the Stratford Festival in Canada, it plays a small role in the overall picture by comparison with drama.

Statistics show that last year 218 dramatic performances were given in 18 weeks before a combined attendance of 325,768. Box office gross was $1,668,190.

During nine weeks last summer, 16 musical performances were attended by 13,754 who brought $66,422 into the boxoffice.

Musical support last year was about one fourth of the peak years from 1964 to 1966.

IT IS of real significance that Katherine Dunham, dancer - choreographer - educator, has been engaged as technical advisor for Inter-Cultural Communications by the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C.

Miss Dunham has made an invaluable contribution to the introduction and preservation of ethnic dance in this country.

She is currently Cultural Affairs Consultant for Illinois University in East St. Louis.

Gunther Schuller

It is not generally known that Miss Dunham purchased and restored the palace of Pauline Bonaparte Leclerc at Le Cap in Northern Haiti where she conducts extensive dance activities.

Concert Calendar

FRIDAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa, conductor. All-Bach: Grand Overture, Opus 18, No. 4 (J. C. Bach); Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; Magnificat — Tanglewood Festival Chorus; Carole Board; Rose Taylor; John McCollum; David Clatworthy, 9 p.m.

Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony String Trio, 7 p.m.

SATURDAY

Berkshire Festival, Boston Symphony, Ozawa. Serenade for Winds, K.388, Mozart; Serenade for Violin, Bernstein (Joseph Silverstein, violin); Serenade for Flute, Berio (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute); Serenade for Strings, Tchaikovsky. 8:30 p.m.

SUNDAY

Berskshire Festival, Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas. The Seasons, Vivaldi (Silverstein, violin); Music from The Vesters of 1610, Monteverdi (Tanglewood Festival Chorus). 2:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUN 28 1971

New England Newsclip

Schuller, Main Speaker

BMC Students Welcomed

By ANNE-GERARD FLYNN

"You ought not to cling to preconceived notions about Tanglewood, but let this place wash over you. Let yourself be open to the 1,001 contacts that will affect you while you are here. It is the total experience of meeting your peers, of hearing great performances both in the Shed and your own concerts on the other side of the lawn in the Theatre-Concert Hall and living in this open nature that is of the ultimate importance," Gunther Schuller told the 297 students gathered for the 31st opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center. The affair, held yesterday afternoon in the Theatre-Concert Hall, marked the opening of the Tanglewood season, and from all indications it should be a lively and productive summer.

Whitestone

Schuller urging students to 'discover beyond self.'

An audience of 1,200 filled the hall and heard the artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center deliver the main address. The Center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advance study of music, and this year's student enrollment comes from 28 states and 17 foreign countries.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the BSO, welcomed the students, and set the humorous tone for the afternoon program.

The scholarly looking man also introduced the speakers and informed the students that although Schuller never had been a student at the Center, unlike the other speaker on the program, Seiji Ozawa, he was "in all other respects a perfect gentleman."

Schuller, noting that he has been associated with the Center for nine years, observed that "Tanglewood in its own way, has helped shape trends that have altered music in the last decade."

Contemporary Music

The main core of his address was aimed at the acceptance of contemporary music, which he defined as "the present state of music on a continuous spectrum that dates back to the 1700s." He said that few people realize the historical background of contemporary music and pointed out that "the step across the threshold in atonality was inherent in the diatonic tonality and highly chromatic works of Brahms."

The large-framed artistic director urged the students to respond to the advances in music, which he compared to flying to the moon and climbing Mt. Everett. He asked what would have happened if the contemporaries of Brahms and Beethoven had refused to be influenced by these two masters, and called for closer cooperation between composer and performer. He said that only twice before had music undergone anything near the revolution it is experiencing today. These similar revolutions, he explained, occurred during the Middle Ages when the use of church modes was replaced by diatonic modes, and music for single voices was expanded to two and three-part music.

"Today music reaches out in all directions, toward Renaissance music, toward the study of ethnic music, which would at one-time have been regarded as the weird aberrations of primitive peoples," Schuller told the group of informally dressed students.

"To learn anything new requires additional input on the part of the learner. Such effort is often more than one has been prepared to give. The Berkshire Music Center is designed to fill in these gaps in education. It is designed to open one's vision, sharpen one's talent and, most important, to impart to one the excitement of seeing beyond one's self," Schuller continued.

He appealed to the students to overcome the natural resistance that results from a sharp break with tradition, and left them with the hope that their "eight-week voyage at the Center would be one of discovery of self, of other people and things and even of contemporary music."

Bernstein Message

Seiji Ozawa, also an artistic director at the Center, preceded Schuller on the program. He read a short telephone message from Leonard Bernstein, who is an adviser at the Center and is now in California working on a new production of "Candide."

Bernstein expressed regret at not being present, but told the students to keep in mind the principle of hope, which was the subject of his speech when he addressed the opening exercises last year.

Ozawa, now music director of the Japanese Philharmonic Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, spoke to the students about his stay at the Center some 11 years ago.

"You cannot learn everything in eight weeks, but what you do learn will open your eyes and ears. Music is very difficult. Every performance is like an examination. When you hit the wrong note, I know it, God knows it and you know it. However, the more difficult it is the more marvelous it becomes. That is our life and I am sure you will go through with it, just as I did."

Curtis Buttenheim, representing the Council of Tanglewood Friends, invited the students to explore Berkshire County, "Chock full of places to see, blessed with scenery and steep in history." He won unexpected applause from the students when he offered to find private practice rooms for them.

Roman Totenberg, on the faculty of the Boston University at Tanglewood, gave a draining performance of Bach's unaccompanied suite for the violin in G minor.

In his address, Schuller quoted from an opening address founder Serge Koussevitzky delivered in 1946 and in which he said the question of creative vocation in man is a question of new consciousness. The Berkshire Music Center students, directed by John Oliver, gave a fine expression of their first creative consciousness when they joined voices to sing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" at the conclusion of the exercises. The "Alleluia" was especially commissioned for the exercises by Koussevitzky in 1940.

The crowd adjourned for tea in the formal gardens. But as Perry observed, "Tea hasn't been served there for 50 years," and the public without complaint restored itself on sherbert punch and cookies.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

MAY 1971

Whitestone Photo

Leonard Bernstein rehearsing the BMC orchestra

YOUNG CLASSICAL MUSICIANS TODAY—AND TOMORROW

At the Berkshire Music Center, students are optimistic about their carrers in the Seventies

By ROBERT S. CLARK

DURING the past winter of the classical recording industry's discontent, I have thought often of the two days I spent last August at the Berkshire Music Center, the teaching arm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer establishment at Tanglewood, Massachusetts. They were days of listening to some remarkable music-making, sitting in on classes and rehearsals, and, most important, encountering the attitudes and opinions of the students who will tomorrow be our concert soloists, composers, orchestral players, and music teachers.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, then musical director of the BSO, to give young musicians the opportunity to study and perform with members of the orchestra and other prominent musicians. For its eight-week term this past summer, the Center had 158 young (nineteen to twenty-nine) instrumentalists, singers, composers, and conductors enrolled in its Fellowship Program, the only thing of its kind in the world operated and wholly paid for by a symphony orchestra. The fellows this past summer worked with such outstanding musicians as flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, oboist Ralph Gomberg, and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, all of the BSO; violinists Paul Zukofsky, Aaron Rosand, and Matthew Raimondi; pianists Lillian Kallir, Claude Frank, and Byron Janis; composer Charles Wuorinen and soprano Phyllis Curtin.

In 1970, too, Gunther Schuller assumed artistic co-direction of Tanglewood with Seiji Ozawa, and made the Center his primary responsibility. Although, in his remarks at the opening ceremony, he disclaimed any intention of drastic change, his influence was felt at once. The program for conductors, with Leon Barzin in charge, was expanded and the number of student instrumentalists increased, enabling the Center to form a chamber orchestra in addition to the full orchestra and smaller chamber groups of previous years. By means of rotation, each Center student had some exposure to the three different kinds of ensemble and repertoire. Schuller himself worked a great deal with both the chamber orchestra and the full orchestra—one of the summer's outstanding events was the American premiere, under Schuller's direction, of Luigi Nono's cantata for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Il Canto sospeso, during the annual Festival of Contemporary Music presented by the Center and the Fromm Music Foundation. Another of Schuller's innovations was the "open rehearsal": the Center Orchestra, led variously by Schuller, Ozawa, Leonard Bernstein, Michael Tilson Thomas, and the conducting fellows, performed (for audiences) repertoire that had not received rehearsal sufficient for a finished performance. Thus the participants were able to work on—and the audiences to hear—a range of repertoire broader than would have been possible had a polished rendering been the goal. Schuller also continued the "Contemporary Trends" series, which he, as head of the Center's contemporary music activity, had introduced to the Tanglewood programs in 1968. Last summer, on six evenings, the Center students and audiences heard the Who, Jethro Tull, Joe Cocker, John Sebastian, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band, Odetta, and many others.

I had gone to the Center principally to find out what the students were thinking as they completed their summer of study. How, I wondered, did these young musicians feel about careers in a field whose future was clouded with uncertainty, whose financial condition approached the disastrous in many parts of the country; and whose prestige was low, perhaps particularly among people their own age? It was refreshing to find that these questions, which have worried pundits through many columns of newsprint, were not very much on the students' minds. What was very much on their minds was music—studying it, performing it, composing it.

(Continued on page 50)

Most of these young performers were optimistic about the future of classical music in America, although one cellist admitted that, for those like himself who "are not Pinky Zukerman—he had it made when he was fifteen," a job in the string section of an American orchestra could no longer be counted upon. The young people of today, most of the students felt, are a potential audience for classical music, and current fashions in popular music were providing a kind of "lead-in" to classical music by borrowing from it. One student pointed out that Rite of Spring would not have sounded out of place between the rock bands that had appeared at a recent "Contemporary Trends" concert. "A lot of rock fans tell me they think Mahler is groovy," said one girl, a charming pianist whom I had heard playing (and pedaling barefoot) through a lusty rendition of the finale of Brahms' Piano Trio in C. "And they'll warm up to Brahms when they get around to hearing it."

I ASKED a young composer about the problem of finding an audience for his works. He replied that, in our time, when popular music is disseminated largely through recordings, they were the ideal way to reach a classical audience as well. The coming decade, he felt, would see more and more composing with recording in mind—concert performance, with its obvious limitations, would decline in importance. As for style, the 1970's would be an era of eclecticism. "I think we've seen the last of the technique-centered cliques," said a University of Michigan student, "the feeling that if you wrote, say, aleatory music you were on the side of the good guys." And another composer added, "I don't feel it is part of my job to move music in any particular direction." "I'm not content," the first went on, "to appeal just to the university modern-music circles, as composers did in the Fifties and Sixties. We're looking for wider exposure—in centuries past, you know, the leading composers were heard by large numbers of people. Recordings can reach a broad public. The techniques I want to use are available in this medium, too—mixing of electronic, instrumental, and vocal sounds, for example. Rock musicians have moved out a bit in this direction, but they are limited by commercial considerations. I want to say something unique with my music. I think young people are ready to listen to me—but I may be naïve about that." And what of the repertoire of the concert halls and recordings today? Will young audiences want to hear Bach and Beethoven as well as the music that will be "now" in the Seventies? "Our concert halls and opera houses are in bad shape, in matters of both finance and morale. Changes will have to come to bring more people in. But the classics won't die. They are too great to die."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUN 28 1971

New England Newsclip

Schuller, Main Speaker

BMC Students Welcomed

By ANNE-GERARD FLYNN

"You ought not to cling to preconceived notions about Tanglewood, but let this place wash over you. Let yourself be open to the 1,001 contacts that will affect you while you are here. It is the total experience of meeting your peers, of hearing great performances both in the Shed and your own concerts on the other side of the lawn in the Theatre-Concert Hall and living in this open nature that is of the ultimate importance," Gunther Schuller told the 297 students gathered for the 31st opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center. The affair, held yesterday afternoon in the Theatre-Concert Hall, marked the opening of the Tanglewood season, and from all indications it should be a lively and productive summer.

Whitestone

Schuller urging students to 'discover beyond self.'

An audience of 1,200 filled the hall and heard the artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center deliver the main address. The Center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advance study of music, and this year's student enrollment comes from 28 states and 17 foreign countries.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the BSO, welcomed the students, and set the humorous tone for the afternoon program.

The scholarly looking man also introduced the speakers and informed the students that although Schuller never had been a student at the Center, unlike the other speaker on the program, Seiji Ozawa, he was "in all other respects a perfect gentleman."

Schuller, noting that he has been associated with the Center for nine years, observed that "Tanglewood in its own way, has helped shape trends that have altered music in the last decade."

Contemporary Music

The main core of his address was aimed at the acceptance of contemporary music, which he defined as "the present state of music on a continuous spectrum that dates back to the 1700s." He said that few people realize the historical background of contemporary music and pointed out that "the step across the threshold in atonality was inherent in the diatonic tonality and highly chromatic works of Brahms."

The large-framed artistic director urged the students to respond to the advances in music, which he compared to flying to the moon and climbing Mt. Everett. He asked what would have happened if the contemporaries of Brahms and Beethoven had refused to be influenced by these two masters, and called for closer cooperation between composer and performer. He said that only twice before had music undergone anything near the revolution it is experiencing today. These similar revolutions, he explained, occurred during the Middle Ages when the use of church modes was replaced by diatonic modes, and music for single voices was expanded to two and three-part music.

"Today music reaches out in all directions, toward Renaissance music, toward the study of ethnic music, which would at one-time have been regarded as the weird aberrations of primitive peoples," Schuller told the group of informally dressed students.

"To learn anything new requires additional input on the part of the learner. Such effort is often more than one has been prepared to give. The Berkshire Music Center is designed to fill in these gaps in education. It is designed to open one's vision, sharpen one's talent and, most important, to impart to one the excitement of seeing beyond one's self," Schuller continued.

He appealed to the students to overcome the natural resistance that results from a sharp break with tradition, and left them with the hope that their "eight-week voyage at the Center would be one of discovery of self, of other people and things and even of contemporary music."

Bernstein Message

Seiji Ozawa, also an artistic director at the Center, preceded Schuller on the program. He read a short telephone message from Leonard Bernstein, who is an adviser at the Center and is now in California working on a new production of "Candide."

Bernstein expressed regret at not being present, but told the students to keep in mind the principle of hope, which was the subject of his speech when he addressed the opening exercises last year.

Ozawa, now music director of the Japanese Philharmonic Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, spoke to the students about his stay at the Center some 11 years ago.

"You cannot learn everything in eight weeks, but what you do learn will open your eyes and ears. Music is very difficult. Every performance is like an examination. When you hit the wrong note, I know it, God knows it and you know it. However, the more difficult it is the more marvelous it becomes. That is our life and I am sure you will go through with it, just as I did."

Curtis Buttenheim, representing the Council of Tanglewood Friends, invited the students to explore Berkshire County, "Chock full of places to see, blessed with scenery and steep in history." He won unexpected applause from the students when he offered to find private practice rooms for them.

Roman Totenberg, on the faculty of the Boston University at Tanglewood, gave a draining performance of Bach's unaccompanied suite for the violin in G minor.

In his address, Schuller quoted from an opening address founder Serge Koussevitzky delivered in 1946 and in which he said the question of creative vocation in man is a question of new consciousness. The Berkshire Music Center students, directed by John Oliver, gave a fine expression of their first creative consciousness when they joined voices to sing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" at the conclusion of the exercises. The "Alleluia" was especially commissioned for the exercises by Koussevitzky in 1940.

The crowd adjourned for tea in the formal gardens. But as Perry observed, "Tea hasn't been served there for 50 years," and the public without complaint restored itself on sherbert punch and cookies.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163.400

MAY 1971

Whitestone Photo

Leonard Bernstein rehearsing the BMC orchestra

YOUNG CLASSICAL MUSICIANS TODAY—AND TOMORROW

At the Berkshire Music Center, students are optimistic about their carrers in the Seventies

By ROBERT S. CLARK

DURING the past winter of the classical recording industry's discontent, I have thought often of the two days I spent last August at the Berkshire Music Center, the teaching arm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer establishment at Tanglewood, Massachusetts. They were days of listening to some remarkable music-making, sitting in on classes and rehearsals, and, most important, encountering the attitudes and opinions of the students who will tomorrow be our concert soloists, composers, orchestral players, and music teachers.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, then musical director of the BSO, to give young musicians the opportunity to study and perform with members of the orchestra and other prominent musicians. For its eight-week term this past summer, the Center had 158 young (nineteen to twenty-nine) instrumentalists, singers, composers, and conductors enrolled in its Fellowship Program, the only thing of its kind in the world operated and wholly paid for by a symphony orchestra. The fellows this past summer worked with such outstanding musicians as flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, oboist Ralph Gomberg, and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, all of the BSO; violinists Paul Zukofsky, Aaron Rosand, and Matthew Raimondi; pianists Lillian Kallir, Claude Frank, and Byron Janis; composer Charles Wuorinen and soprano Phyllis Curtin.

In 1970, too, Gunther Schuller assumed artistic co-direction of Tanglewood with Seiji Ozawa, and made the Center his primary responsibility. Although, in his remarks at the opening ceremony, he disclaimed any intention of drastic change, his influence was felt at once. The program for conductors, with Leon Barzin in charge, was expanded and the number of student instrumentalists increased, enabling the Center to form a chamber orchestra in addition to the full orchestra and smaller chamber groups of previous years. By means of rotation, each Center student had some exposure to the three different kinds of ensemble and repertoire. Schuller himself worked a great deal with both the chamber orchestra and the full orchestra—one of the summer's outstanding events was the American premiere, under Schuller's direction, of Luigi Nono's cantata for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, Il Canto sospeso, during the annual Festival of Contemporary Music presented by the Center and the Fromm Music Foundation. Another of Schuller's innovations was the "open rehearsal": the Center Orchestra, led variously by Schuller, Ozawa, Leonard Bernstein, Michael Tilson Thomas, and the conducting fellows, performed (for audiences) repertoire that had not received rehearsal sufficient for a finished performance. Thus the participants were able to work on—and the audiences to hear—a range of repertoire broader than would have been possible had a polished rendering been the goal. Schuller also continued the "Contemporary Trends" series, which he, as head of the Center's contemporary music activity, had introduced to the Tanglewood programs in 1968. Last summer, on six evenings, the Center students and audiences heard the Who, Jethro Tull, Joe Cocker, John Sebastian, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band, Odetta, and many others.

I had gone to the Center principally to find out what the students were thinking as they completed their summer of study. How, I wondered, did these young musicians feel about careers in a field whose future was clouded with uncertainty, whose financial condition approached the disastrous in many parts of the country, and whose prestige was low, perhaps particularly among people their own age? It was refreshing to find that these questions, which have worried pundits through many columns of newsprint, were not very much on the students' minds. What was very much on their minds was music—studying it, performing it, composing it.

(Continued on page 50)

Most of these young performers were optimistic about the future of classical music in America, although one cellist admitted that, for those like himself who "are not Pinky Zukerman—he had it made when he was fifteen," a job in the string section of an American orchestra could no longer be counted upon. The young people of today, most of the students felt, are a potential audience for classical music, and current fashions in popular music were providing a kind of "lead-in" to classical music by borrowing from it. One student pointed out that Rite of Spring would not have sounded out of place between the rock bands that had appeared at a recent "Contemporary Trends" concert. "A lot of rock fans tell me they think Mahler is groovy," said one girl, a charming pianist whom I had heard playing (and pedaling barefoot) through a lusty rendition of the finale of Brahms' Piano Trio in C. "And they'll warm up to Brahms when they get around to hearing it."

I ASKED a young composer about the problem of finding an audience for his works. He replied that, in our time, when popular music is disseminated largely through recordings, they were the ideal way to reach a classical audience as well. The coming decade, he felt, would see more and more composing with recording in mind—concert performance, with its obvious limitations, would decline in importance. As for style, the 1970's would be an era of eclecticism. "I think we've seen the last of the technique-centered cliques," said a University of Michigan student, "the feeling that if you wrote, say, aleatory music you were on the side of the good guys." And another composer added, "I don't feel it is part of my job to move music in any particular direction." "I'm not content," the first went on, "to appeal just to the university modern-music circles, as composers did in the Fifties and Sixties. We're looking for wider exposure—in centuries past, you know, the leading composers were heard by large numbers of people. Recordings can reach a broad public. The techniques I want to use are available in this medium, too—mixing of electronic, instrumental, and vocal sounds, for example. Rock musicians have moved out a bit in this direction, but they are limited by commercial considerations. I want to say something unique with my music. I think young people are ready to listen to me—but I may be naïve about that." And what of the repertoire of the concert halls and recordings today? Will young audiences want to hear Bach and Beethoven as well as the music that will be "now" in the Seventies? "Our concert halls and opera houses are in bad shape, in matters of both finance and morale. Changes will have to come to bring more people in. But the classics won't die. They are too great to die."

109

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUN 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Center Greets Students

By RICHARD CONWAY

The 32nd annual opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center took place Sunday afternoon in the Theatre - Concert Hall on the beautiful Tanglewood grounds in Lenox.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened the program with words of welcome and told the good-sized audience that this year some 297 students from 17 countries were enrolled in the school and 28 states of the United States were represented.

He noted that as is so often the case, the school would probably learn more from its students than it would give in return. (Any educators in the audience had to know exactly what he meant.)

Two of the Center's three artistic directors spoke at the opening. The third, Leonard Bernstein, who could not be present, sent his best wishes for the students and informed the audience that he was hard at work on a major composition to be premiered at the John F. Kennedy Performing Arts Center in Washington this fall.

Brief remarks were made by Seiji Ozawa, the brilliant young Japanese conductor, who was himself a student at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960.

Obviously very popular with the s tudents, he told them that every performance they gave would be a testing hall for themselves and the school. He said that, as a student, he thought that as he got older and more experienced music would become easier. He found that this was not so. It became more and more demanding, and yet more marvelous and beautiful.

Trying to say what ne wanted to say in the English language was difficult for him. But the message got through. The true musician used his head, his heart, and his hands to bring the marvel to life.

The principle address of the afternoon was given by Gunther Schuller—composer, conductor, and president of the New England Conservatory.

Schuller began with much the same theme as that expressed by Ozawa, but this soon proved to be a subordinate theme. The principal theme was of the necessity for composer, performer, audience, and students to come to grips with contemporary music.

He told his listeners that so often students came to the Center with little background in, or even knowledge of, contemporary compositions. He said that these works must be viewed as "part of a total spectrum which stretches across time."

So often the effort to learn new music is more than one wants to give, Schuller said. But he noted that unless one does reach out to the new experience, he has already stoppd growing.

He urged the students to find the excitement and revelation of truly seeing and hearing new music. And he pleaded for a restoral of the "sense of faith between performer and composer."

Schuller emphasized that during the eight weeks of their summer at Tanglewood, the students should reach out in all directions for a "totality of experiences."

The program was brought to its traditional close with the singing of the Randall Thompson "Alleluia," which was composed in 1940 for the opening of the Berkshire Music Center.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 10 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Offers Broader Repertorie

This is the second in a four - part series on the regional musical festivals and their educational workshops.

By RICHARD CONWAY

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood is structured toward rather different ends.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and head of the faculty of the Center, said that they tried to provide the young professional or the soon - to - be professional, an opportunity to delve more deeply into repertoire.

Silverstein emphasized that most of the colleges and universities that the students attend simply cannot provide this kind of training due to the very nature of their overall academic programs.

At the Berkshire Center, students spend their time studying various works from the different stylistic periods in music history. While the Center's orchestra does give concerts, this is not the primary aim of the program.

A new program this year, which is something of a revival of an older one, is that for singers. Training in vocal technique and a broadening of repertoire are its two principal aims. Officials said that there would be an emphasis on hearing and understanding contemporary.

In addition, this year inaugurates a Music Theatre Project. The works to be performed are those utilizing smal: casts and orchestras and only slight scenic demands.

Silverstein talked at some length about contemporary music and pointed to the Contemporary Music Project which takes place during the last week or two of the Tanglewood season. Several works have been premiered there over the past several seasons.

Both Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music offer college credit for certain programs that can be taken at Tanglewood.

In short, the place is constantly alive with activity. Looking at a typical schedule, the student seems to have little time for anything but music and more music.

The Berkshire Music Center gets results though. Of 30 major symphony orchestras in this country, 293 musicians had training at the Center. As might be guessed, the Boston Orchestra alone has 41 of these.

Two Western Massachusetts musicians are at the Center this summer on fellowships — Claudia Anderson, a flutist from Amherst, and Stephen Gobel, an oboist from Sheffield. Several members of the Springfield Symphony are also there.

Some very well - known names have come out of the Berkshire school. There is Burt Bacharach, of popular music fame. And conductors Leonard Bernstein, Zubin Mehta, Seiji Ozawa, and Michael Tilson Thomas have all spent summers there.

One of the most interesting programs going on at Tanglewood is the one known as "Days in the Arts."

Unfortunately — we think — this program is available only to Title One schools in the Boston area.

Miss Mary Jo Sanna, who is in charge of the project, said that under a grant from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, each week during the Tanglewood season 30 youngsters, age 11 and 12, are bussed from Boston to the Berkshires.

Housed at the Windsor Mountain School, where the Music Center students are also house, their four day stay from Tuesday to Friday will give them encounters with many of the performing arts and artists.

Besides Tanglewood, they will be taken to the Williamstown Theatre and to Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. There will be a side visit to the Pleasant Valley Sanctuary, and time for a picnic and swimming.

For most of the children, it is their first real contact with professional musicians, actors, and dancers, Miss Sanna emphasized. And the performers almost always take time out to talk with the youngsters, and give them brief demonstrations of how things are done. Where ever possible, the children themselves are given an opportunity to participate.

Next: Red Fox Music Camp.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

JUN 25 1971 Bufferello

Berkshire Music Festival opening at Tanglewood

Berkshire Musical Center's Tanglewood season opens at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in the Theater-Concert Hall at Lenox, Mass., with the 31st annual opening exercises of the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music.

Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" will be sung by 400 students of the Berkshire Music Center. Thompson's "Alleluia" was commissioned by Serge Koussevitzky for the initial opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940. A reception in Tanglewood's formal Gardens will follow. The public is invited to the exercises and the reception.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert next Friday evening at 9 o'clock in the Shed. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa conducts. The program opens with Johann Christian Bach's Grand overture in D, followed by two works by Johann Sebastian Bach: Brandenburg concerto No. 6 and "Magnificat," with soloists soprano Carole Bogard, alto Rose Taylor, tenor John McCollum, bass David Clatworthy, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

The weekend prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents the Boston Symphony String Trio. The prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. symphony concert.

The summer's first open rehearsal is Saturday morning, July 3 at 10:30 in the Shed. Open rehearsals are held in the Shed each Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. and benefit the orchestra's pension fund. They offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing Berkshire Festival music. Seats are unreserved and are available the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, July 3 at 8:30 in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts with soloists Joseph Silverstein, concert master of the Boston Symphony, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute. The program is Mozart's Serenade No. 12 for winds, "Nacht Musique," Bernstein's Serenade for violin, strings, and percussion, Berio's Serenata for flute and 14 instruments and Tchaikovsky's Serenade in C for strings.

Sunday afternoon, July 4, at 2:30 Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts Vivaldi's "The Season," and selections from Monteverdi's "Vespro Della Beata Vergine" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Bacharach matinee

A special late afternoon performance timed for family attendance on Saturday, July 3, has been added to the schedule of shows by Burt Bacharach at the Garden State Arts Center, Holmdel.

The added Bacharach performance will start at 5 p.m. that Saturday.

His originally scheduled six evening shows at the Arts Center from Monday, June 28, through July 3, have been sold out with the exception of lawn space.

The special Saturday afternoon show is to be over at approximately 7 p.m. and follows the concept of family matinees at the Arts Center.

Tickets for the added Bacharach performance can be purchased at the Arts Center box office in Telegraph Hill Park off Parkway Exit 116 starting Thursday. Meanwhile, mail orders can be sent by addressing Bacharach Afternoon, Garden State Arts Center, Box 116, Holmdel, N.J. 07733.

Appearing with Bacharach at each of his seven Arts Center shows will be the instrumental and vocal group Orange Colored Sky, who performed with the popular composer-arranger-conductor in Las Vegas.

Newport Jazz Festival

Eighteen consecutive summers is a long time for a jazz festival to last. Woodstock made a huge splash in one year but now it belongs to the ages. But the Newport Jazz Festival goes on and on, stronger, more vital and more important than ever.

This year's Newport Jazz Festival will be held July 2, 3, 4, 5 in Newport, R.I. Some 60,000 jazz fans are expected to attend.

This year's event has popular artists like Dionne Warwick, soul queen Aretha Franklin, Stan Kenton and Buddy Rich and nostalgia with Billy Eckstine and George Shearing also Willie "The Lion" Smith and Eubie Blake. Electronically inclined jazz artists like Miles Davis also are on the program along with about 25 other major artists.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 105,767

MAY 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Young Artists Awards Offers New Scholarships

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Young Artists Awards has a number of new scholarships of $300 each available to young women music students, residents of Massachusetts, for the pursuit of their education.

Beginning next September, these new scholarships will be in addition to those already awarded and subject to renewal by decisions of the trustees.

The amount of renewed scholarship is $350 and may be awarded annually without further audition until the recipient has received a bachelor's degree in music.

For the fifth year since these awards were instituted in 1950, three fellowships of $500 each will be awarded to young women for study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Auditions for the Tanglewood fellowships are held at Symphony Hall, Boston. Names of the recipients will be announced shortly.

June Auditions

New candidates for the regular awards will be heard by a board of judges Thursday evening, June 3, at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 308 Main St., Worcester.

Judges will be Mrs Naomi Amos, faculty member of Worcester Community School of the Performing Arts; Edward D. Langille, director of instrumental music at Doherty Memorial High School; and Raymond Morin, chairman. Receptionist will be Mrs. Nicholas Zook.

All auditions are by appointment only. Applications must be postmarked not later than midnight, Friday, May 28.

Recipients of these scholarships, under the terms of the anonymous fund, are to be "such female students of music who are residents of Massachusetts and who are in need of financial assistance, as deemed by the trustees, to be the most worthy and deserving of assistance."

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

All scholarships must be applied toward tuition in accredited institutions of musical learning. These may be anywhere in the United States. Each candiate must be working for a degree with a music major.

Qualifications

Age limits are: Freshmen, not over 22 years of age; sophomores, 23; juniors, 24; seniors, 25. Although Young Artists Awards have fellowships available for graduate study, these will not be considered at the June 3 auditions.

Audition forms may be obtained by writing to Raymond Morin, 45 West Hill Drive, Worcester 01609.

Applicants may major in piano, voice, and any instrument of the symphony orchestra; also, organ, music education, sacred music, public school music, and musical therapy.

Since 1950, Young Artists Awards has assisted 103 young women with their musical education in 34 musical institutions throughout the country. Scholarships have amounted to nearly $90,000.

MUCH international good will was created by Worcester Polytechnic Institute Glee Club and Brass Choir on its recent 12-day performing tour of England.

It was a return visit to Oxford University for Prof. Louis J. Curran, glee club and brass group director, who was on leave from WPI last year to study for his doctorate. Curran will return to Oxford this summer to complete the work.

A large part of the total cost of $16,500 was paid by the students. Less than $4,000 came from the college's music budget. The students raised $3,500 from a raffle they ran themselves, and each paid $200 of his own money to make the trip.

They sang and played for audiences totalling over 3,000 at Oxford, Worcester, Shrewsbury and London.

Purpose of the tour was to gain knowledge by European exposure and further the prestige of Worcester Tech.

Other Worcester

In Worcester, England, they presented greetings and a key to the city from their local counterparts, City Manager Francis J. McGrath and Mayor Joseph M. Tinsley. They also presented a letter of greetings from the Shrewsbury Board of Selectmen in Massachusetts to town officials in Shrewsbury, England.

One vivid memory of the brass group was climbing 232 steps to the tower of Worcester (Eng.) Cathedral from which they performed.

Curran was assisted by John Minasian, glee club president, and Robert M. Byrne, tour manager.

Their program included Des Pres' Miss Mater Patris, and special repertory from England, the Continent and America.

Vocal soloists were Byrne, Thomas Ferguson, Mark Whitley and John Gibson.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

JUN 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Musical Events

Organ concerts at Hartt College of Music, 200 Bloomfield Ave, West Hartford, reservations from 523-4811, at 8:30 pm June 14, 15, 17; fourth concert with Marilyn Mason, guest artist, at Hartford Center Church, 8:30 pm June 18.

At Hartt College of Music, summer festival of chamber music, series adm are $12 for 9 concerts; individual concerts $2 each:

NY Brass Quintet, now in residence at the College, 16th, 18th Century & recent works, in Millard Auditorium 8:30 pm June 20.

Auditions for Barber Shop Singers at Elks Home, 346 Main St, Danury, also program & refreshments; infor from 792-0492, 8 pm June 8, 15, 22.

New Haven Symphony on New Haven Green, if rainy in Sprague Hall, corner College & Wall Sts; 8 pm June 11, 18, 25.

Skitch Henderson leads Hudson Valley Philharmonic in benefit concert for the orchestra at Poughkeepsie NY HS; send stamped, addressed envelope for tickets, $12 patrons, $6 preferred session, $3 students to Box 191, Pouthkeepsie; concert is 8:30 pm June 19.

At Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, Berkshire Music Center of Boston Symphony gives summer classes of vocal music and Leonard Bernstein working with the Symphony; write Registrar, The Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

Music Mountain in Falls Village opens its season July 3, adds 2 Sunday concerts to the usual Saturday schedule, also children's concert. Call 927-3780 for more info.

NEWS-RECORD
DALTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,012

APR 29 1971 New England Newsclip

Summer Academy Program At Tanglewood Announced

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French Vocal Coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The Master Classes, under the direction of Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight-week session, Lorna Cooke deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

APR 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Expanded Vocal Program Listed At Berkshire

BOSTON — The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The master classes, under the direction of Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight week session, Lorna Cooke deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conducters as well as choristers of all levels of accomplishment.

All members of the choral workshop and singing project sing in the Tanglewood choir which performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
BI-WEEKLY 3,988

MAY 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Vocal Program In Berkshires

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes Master Classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French Vocal Coach Pierre Bernac and a Choral Workshop.

For further information about the Singing Project and the Choral Workshop, contact Sally Jackson, Registrar, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass, 02115.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 195,767

MAY 9 1971 New England Newsclip

Young Artists Awards Offers New Scholarships

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Young Artists Awards has a number of new scholarships of $300 each available to young women music students, residents of Massachusetts, for the pursuit of their education.

Beginning next September, these new scholarships will be in addition to those already awarded and subject to renewal by decisions of the trustees.

The amount of renewed scholarship is $350 and may be awarded annually without further audition until the recipient has received a bachelor's degree in music.

For the fifth year since these awards were instituted in 1950, three fellowships of $500 each will be awarded to young women for study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Auditions for the Tanglewood fellowships are held at Symphony Hall, Boston. Names of the recipients will be announced shortly.

June Auditions

New candidates for the regular awards will be heard by a board of judges Thursday evening, June 3, at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 308 Main St., Worcester.

Judges will be Mrs Naomi Amos, faculty member of Worcester Community School of the Performing Arts; Edward D. Langille, director of instrumental music at Doherty Memorial High School; and Raymond Morin, chairman. Receptionist will be Mrs. Nicholas Zook.

All auditions are by appointment only. Applications must be postmarked not later than midnight, Friday, May 28.

Recipients of these scholarships, under the terms of the anonymous fund, are to be "such female students of music who are residents of Massachusetts and who are in need of financial assistance, as deemed by the trustees, to be the most worthy and deserving of assistance."

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

All scholarships must be applied toward tuition in accredited institutions of musical learning. These may be anywhere in the United States. Each candiate must be working for a degree with a music major.

Qualifications

Age limits are: Freshmen, not over 22 years of age; sophomores, 23; juniors, 24; seniors, 25. Although Young Artists Awards have fellowships available for graduate study, these will not be considered at the June 3 auditions.

Audition forms may be obtained by writing to Raymond Morin, 45 West Hill Drive, Worcester 01609.

Applicants may major in piano, voice, and any instrument of the symphony orchestra; also, organ, music education, sacred music, public school music, and musical therapy.

Since 1950, Young Artists Awards has assisted 103 young women with their musical education in 34 musical institutions throughout the country. Scholarships have amounted to nearly $90,000.

MUCH international good will was created by Worcester Polytechnic Institute Glee Club and Brass Choir on its recent 12-day performing tour of England.

It was a return visit to Oxford University for Prof. Louis J. Curran, glee club and brass group director, who was on leave from WPI last year to study for his doctorate. Curran will return to Oxford this summer to complete the work.

A large part of the total cost of $16,500 was paid by the students. Less than $4,000 came from the college's music budget. The students raised $3,500 from a raffle they ran themselves, and each paid $200 of his own money to make the trip.

They sang and played for audiences totalling over 3,000 at Oxford, Worcester, Shrewsbury and London.

Purpose of the tour was to gain knowledge by European exposure and further the prestige of Worcester Tech.

Other Worcester

In Worcester, England, they presented greetings and a key to the city from their local counterparts, City Manager Francis J. McGrath and Mayor Joseph M. Tinsley. They also presented a letter of greetings from the Shrewsbury Board of Selectmen in Massachusetts to town officials in Shrewsbury, England.

One vivid memory of the brass group was climbing 232 steps to the tower of Worcester (Eng.) Cathedral from which they performed.

Curran was assisted by John Minasian, glee club president, and Robert M. Byrne, tour manager.

Their program included Des Pres' Miss Mater Patris, and special repertory from England, the Continent and America.

Vocal soloists were Byrne, Thomas Ferguson, Mark Whitley and John Gibson.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

JUN 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Musical Events

Organ concerts at Hartt College of Music, 200 Bloomfield Ave, West Hartford, reservations from 523-4811, at 8:30 pm June 14, 15, 17; fourth concert with Marilyn Mason, guest artist, at Hartford Center Church, 8:30 pm June 18.

At Hartt College of Music, summer festival of chamber music, series adm are $12 for 9 concerts; individual concerts $2 each:

NY Brass Quintet, now in residence at the College, 16th, 18th Century & recent works, in Millard Auditorium 8:30 pm June 20.

Auditions for Barber Shop Singers at Elks Home, 346 Main St, Danury, also program & refreshments; infor from 792-0492, 8 pm June 8, 15, 22.

New Haven Symphony on New Haven Green, if rainy in Sprague Hall, corner College & Wall Sts; 8 pm June 11, 18, 25.

Skitch Henderson leads Hudson Valley Philharmonic in benefit concert for the orchestra at Poughkeepsie NY HS; send stamped, addressed envelope for tickets, $12 patrons, $6 preferred session, $3 students to Box 191, Pouthkeepsie; concert is 8:30 pm June 19.

At Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, Berkshire Music Center of Boston Symphony gives summer classes of vocal music and Leonard Bernstein working with the Symphony; write Registrar, The Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

Music Mountain in Falls Village opens its season July 3, adds 2 Sunday concerts to the usual Saturday schedule, also children's concert. Call 927-3780 for more info.

NEWS-RECORD
DALTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,012

APR 29 1971 New England Newsclip

Summer Academy Program At Tanglewood Announced

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French Vocal Coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The Master Classes, under the direction of Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight-week session, Lorna Cooke deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

APR 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Expanded Vocal Program Listed At Berkshire

BOSTON — The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The master classes, under the direction of Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight week session, Lorna Cooke deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conducters as well as choristers of all levels of accomplishment.

All members of the choral workshop and singing project sing in the Tanglewood choir which performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

PHOENIX
BRISTOL, R. I.
BI-WEEKLY 3,988

MAY 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Vocal Program In Berkshires

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes Master Classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French Vocal Coach Pierre Bernac and a Choral Workshop.

For further information about the Singing Project and the Choral Workshop, contact Sally Jackson, Registrar, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass, 02115.

110

SUMMER COURSES SCHEDULED:

There's No Vacation for the Arts

The summer may be a reprieve from the other nine months of the year, but to those concerned with the arts, it is a season of continued study and experimentation.

An expanded vocal music program will be introduced at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy. The curriculum involves master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The master classes will meet 10 hours a week and are open to those seeking training and a broadening of their solo repertoire.

The choral workshop will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. The eight week course will be open to experienced choral conductors and choristers at all levels.

For further information, contact Sally Jackson, Registrar, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

For the sixth consecutive summer, Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts will be offering courses in music, dance, painting and drawing, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox.

The music curriculum at Boston University Tanglewood Institute includes a piano seminar, June 28 to July 24, by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, chairman of the piano department at B.U., and a three-week workshop under the direction of Robert Gartside, assistant professor of voice at B.U. and conductor of the university chorus. In addition, the school offers the young artists program, an eight-week session for a limited number of high school age instrumentalists.

The dance and movement program at Tanglewood will be headed by Clyde Morgan, a soloist with the Jose Limon Dance Company. The six-week program will include a dance workshop, a movement workshop, courses in "Dance History and Materials" and "Music and Sound for Dance."

The painting and drawing program will be under the direction of Iso Papo, a faculty member at B.U. As part of the curriculum, students and faculty will stage several exhibits in the Glass House at the entrance to the Tanglewood grounds.

For further information, contact Edwin E. Stein, Dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University, 855 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, Mass., 02215.

Consuelo Atlas, soloist with The Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater, will teach a 5-week series of dance classes in modern dance, modern jazz, and blues on Saturday afternoons starting May 15. The classes, sponsored by the Institute for Contemporary Dance, will be held at the Radcliffe Gym, 20 Mason St., Cambridge. Elementary-intermediate classes will be at noon and intermediate-advanced classes will be at 2 p.m. The fee for the series is $12.50.

For further information, contact the Institute for Contemporary Dance, P.O. Box 616, Brookline Village, Mass., 02047.

The School of the Worcester Art Museum will hold a session from June 28 through Aug. 6 in drawing, painting, design, sculpture and photography. The courses will be open to high school graduates, college students and adults, and the charge per course is $150.

Applications are being accepted now through June 25. The application form, together with high school and college transcripts, should be addressed to the Clerk of the School, accompanied with a $10 fee.

The Harvard Summer School Theater Workshop will be held from July 6 through Aug. 28 at the Loeb Drama Center in Cambridge. Anna Sokolow will be a member of the teaching faculty. In conjunction with the Players Project of New York, the workshop will continue work on a dramatized version of Kafka's "Metamorphosis."

Applicants to the workshop should have completed the first year of college by June of this year. Some experience in the theater is recommended but not required.

The application form must be in by May 15 and may be obtained by writing Harvard Summer School, Theater Workshop, 735 Holyoke Center, Cambridge, Mass., 02138.

The Cape Playhouse School of Theater, an offshoot of the Raymond Moore Foundation will begin its season on June 21 and will remain in session for six weeks. The school offers Cape Cod high school and college age students the opportunity to learn about theater through formal classroom courses, seminars, and actors' workshops. The tuition for basic enrollment is $45, with other courses carrying individual fees.

For further information, contact George P. Tuttle, Director, Cape Playhouse School of Theater, Dennis, Mass., 02638.

PATRIOT LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 70,525
MAY 6 1971 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD MASS.
(M) 77
APR 22 1971 New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER EXPANDS VOCAL PROGRAM

Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood in Lenox, will feature an expanded vocal program for the summer, including master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac, and a choral workshop.

The classes will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contempoary music.

The workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions.

During the first three weeks of the eight week session, choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries will be compared. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conductors as well as choirsters of all levels of accomplishments.

All members of the choral workshop and singing project sing in the Tanglewood Choir which performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the festival.

For further information about the singing project and the choral workshop, contact Sally Jackson, registrar, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
APR 14 1971 New England Newsclip

BU Offers Courses at Tanglewood

Bos Symphony

For the sixth consecutive summer, Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts will be offering courses in music, dance, painting, and drawing, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox.

The Boston University program, headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts, features applied music instruction by faculty from the Division of Music at BU, as well as members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The music curriculum at Boston University Tanglewood Institute includes a piano seminar, June 28 to July 24, by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, chairman of the piano department at BU, and a three-week workshop, "The Choral Conductor as Singer; The Singer as Choral Conductor," under the direction of Robert Gartside. Gartside is an assistant professor on the voice faculty at BU and is a conductor of the Boston University Chorus.

In addition to the applied music instruction and the two workshops, Boston University also offers the Young Artists Program, an eight-week session for a limited number of exceptionally gifted high school age instrumentalists from throughout the country.

The Young Artists, chosen on the basis of auditions in cities across the country, perform in chamber music groups and in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra. They also have private lessons and coaching from members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from BU's Division of Music.

The dance and movement program at Tanglewood will be headed by Clyde Morgan, a New York dancer who has been a soloist with the Jose Limon Dance Company, as well as other dance companies in Europe and the United States. Morgan will be assisted by Carla Maxwell, also of the Jose Limon Dance Company, and Ze'eva Cohen, a dancer who has appeared with the Anna Sokolow Lyric Theater in addition to serving as a lecturer at the Yale University Drama School.

The dance and movement program will include a Dance Workshop; a Movement Workshop; and courses in "Dance History and Materials" and "Music and Sound for Dance." Participants in the dance and movement workshops will appear in student - faculty performances during the last week of the six-week session.

The painting and drawing program, consisting of workshops on advanced and basic levels, will be under the direction of Iso Papo, a faculty member from BU's Division of Art. He will be assisted by a resident faculty of Sandy Sokoloff, also of BU; Wilbur Niewald, chairman of the painting department, Kansas City Art Institute; Robert D'Arista, professor of art at George Washington University; and Nathan Goldstein, a teacher of painting and drawing at the DeCordova Museum in Lincoln, Mass.

Visiting artists for the painting and drawing program will be Leland Bell, Paul Risaka and Leonard Bacour.

As part of the painting and drawing program, students and faculty in the BU program stage several exhibits in the Glass House at the entrance to the Tanglewood grounds.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
APR 24 1971 New England Newsclip

Bernstein, Phyllis Curtin To Aid BMC Vocal Program

BOSTON — The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for this summer. The program includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

Solo Repertoire

The master classes will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. They will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight-week session, Miss deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries.

The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," with Leonard Bernstein conducting the BSO. Mr. Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks, under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt, will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance.

The workshop will be open to experienced choral conductors as well as choristers of all levels of accomplishment.

All members of the choral workshop and singing project sing in the Tanglewood Choir, which performs with the orchestra under the direction of conductors Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

For further information about the singing project and workshop, contact Sally Jackson, registrar, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
MAY 6 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Expands Vocal Program

BOSTON — The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes Master Classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French Vocal Coach Pierre Bernac and a Choral Workshop.

Choral Workshop

The Master Classes, under the direction of Miss Curtin and Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well, as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The Choral Workshop, under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions.

During the first three weeks of the eight week session, Lorna Cooke deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries. The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performane of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas Sokol will spend the two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era.

The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Hiatt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance.

All members of the Choral Workshop and Singing Project sing in the Tanglewood Choir which performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
W. 61,977

MAY 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Expands Program for Students

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, at Tanglewood, will offer an expanded vocal program this summer.

It includes master classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac.

Classes will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertory. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions and workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

All members of the choral workshop, directed by Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will be members of the Tanglewood Choir. They will sing with the Boston Symphony under conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas at the Berkshire Festival.

WOODSTOCK (Conn.) Music Festival has announced a tentative list of concerts for the music room at Woodstock Academy.

Director David Allan Demers has scheduled The Southern Connecticut Chamber Players, Friday, July 9; Phillip Naegele, viola, and John Buttrick, piano, Wed., July 14; Susan Halligan, pianist, Wed., Aug. 4; The Vermeer Quartet with Chester Brezniak, clarinet, Wed., Aug. 18.

All programs begin at 8:30 p.m.

There will be no rise in ticket costs from last year — $10.00 per adult subscription (two tickets to every concert, $1.25 per ticket), and $3.00 per student subscription (one ticket per concert, 75 cents per ticket).

The address is Woodstock Music Festival, Woodstock Academy, Woodstock, Conn., 06281.

IMPRESSIVE progress was noted in the recent performance by Anna Maria College Glee Club in Foundress Hall. Director Mrs. Wallace Robbins has developed a group with disciplined style, excellent balances, confident procedure, and enthusiastic participation.

Morales' "Missus Est Gabriel" and Weelkes' "The Nightingale" were impressive

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

for security in pitch and ensemble tonal warmth.

The fast-stepping "Geographical Fugue" by Toch had comical words that could be understood and moved at a fast clip without voice collisions. Herrmann's arrangement of "Ye Saints and Servants" was spirited and significant.

Eight student pianists and five singers acquitted themselves with varying degrees of success.

Guest soprano May Ann Knight gave a searching performance of "Pace, Pace" from Verdi's "Il Trovatore."

SOPRANO Beverly Sills is indeed limiting her scope of activity insofar as Bellini's opera, "Norma" is concerned.

In a press interview, Miss Sills stated that "she would sing 'Norma' only for Miss Caldwell (artistic director of The Opera Company of Boston) because of Miss Caldwell's special abilities at creating exciting and dramatic operatic productions."

Fortunately, other divas have been less demanding in their "Norma" vehicles and have been content to appear in less "exciting" productions — such sopranos as Jenny Lind and Rosa Ponselle.

At the Met's 1970 season in Boston, Joan Sutherland sang "Norma" in a production by Paul-Emile Deiber. The sumptuous sets and costumes were by Desmond Heeley.

Anyhow, Miss Sills is scheduled to sing "Norma" with the Opera Company of Boston, staged by Miss Caldwell, as the final production of the company's season, June 11 and 13.

COLBY INSTITUTE, Waterville, Me., will hold its 16th annual Institute of Church Music, Aug. 22-28. Director is Thomas Richner.

Activities include instruction, recitals and a social program.

Instructors are Mildred Andrews, John Powell, Daphne Powell, Richner, Phyllis M. Cobb, Samuel Walter and Adel Heinrich.

Further information: Director of Special Programs, Colby College, Waterville, Me. 04901.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 18 1971 New England Newsclip

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

APR 23 1971 New England Newsclip

Expandad Vocal Program By Berkshire Center

BOSTON — The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music at Tanglewood, announces an expanded vocal program for the summer of 1971. The program includes Master Classes given by soprano Phyllis Curtin and French vocal coach Pierre Bernac and a choral workshop.

The master classes, under the direction of Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac, will meet 10 hours a week and are available to those seeking training and broadening of solo repertoire. The classes will be supplemented by individual coaching sessions as well as a series of workshops devoted to vocal techniques of contemporary music.

The choral workshop under the direction of Lorna Cooke deVaron, Thomas Sokol and Iva Dee Hiatt, will examine the literature and conducting techniques of choral music under rehearsal conditions. During the first three weeks of the eight week session, deVaron will compare choral literature of the 17th and 20th centuries.

The fourth week will be devoted to the study and performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas Sokol will spend the next two weeks studying choral music of the Romantic era. The final three weeks under the direction of Iva Dee Haitt will concentrate on the music of the Renaissance. The Choral workshop will be open to experienced choral conductors as well as choristers of all levels of accomplishment.

Further information about the singing project and the choral workshop may be had by contacting Registrar Sally Jackson, the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 2 1971 New England Newsclip

EAGLE 8/7/71

Violinist Roman Totenberg To Give Recital Monday

Violinist Roman Totenberg of The Berkshire Music Center will give a recital Monday evening at 8:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. With Totenberg will be pianist Victor Rosenbaum. The program will open with a performance of Brahms' Sonata in G Major, followed by Stravinsky's "Duo" and Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, "Kreutzer."

White House Recital

Roman Totenberg has appeared with numerous American orchestras including the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the Cleveland, Minnesota, Indianapolis, Los Angeles and Washington symphony orchestras. In Europe, he has given concerts with major orchestras including the Berlin Philharmonic and the London Philharmonic. His recitals in the United States have included performances in the White House, the Library of Congress, Carnegie Hall and the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art. Totenberg has toured South America with Artur Rubinstein and has given joint recitals with Karol Szymanowski, the Polish composer. Totenberg is professor of music at Boston University and is head of the string department.

Rosenbaum has studied with Leonard Shure in New York and Rosina Lhevinne at the Aspen Music School. A cum laude graduate of Brandeis University,

Whitestone

Roman Totenberg

Rosenbaum did graduate study in theory and composition at Princeton University. He has performed as guest soloist with the Boston Pops and the Indianapolis and Atlanta Symphony orchestras. He is on the faculty of the New England Conservatory where he teaches theory and chamber music, and is assistant head of the piano department. This summer he is teaching and conducting the orchestra at the Merrywood Music School in Lenox.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 8 1971 New England Newsclip

BMC Symphony Plays Tonight

Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, will conduct the season's first concert by the Berkshire Music Center orchestra tonight at 8:30 at Tanglewood. The BMC orchestra is made up of the young musicians spending eight weeks at Tanglewood as students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The program lists three works, the "Corsair" overture of Berlioz, the ballet suite, "Le baiser de la fee," by Stravinsky, and Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony, No. 4."

Admission is free to members of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood or to the general public by a small donation at the gate.

BU's Tanglewood teens

Lenox, Mass.

On Saturday afternoon, there was another concert at Tanglewood. This one however was not in the Shed, but in the smaller Theater-Concert Hall, and the orchestra was not the BSO but the Young Artist Orchestra of Boston University's Tanglewood Institute — 80 or so instrumentalists, average age 17. They are chosen each year by auditions held throughout the United States, and they spend eight weeks at the Berkshire Festival with its facilities for study and practice at their disposal.

Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis, Gunther Schuller, and Michael Tilson Thomas have all spent time with them in rehearsals and members of the Boston Symphony have been at hand for chamber music sessions.

Under the direction of their mentor, James Yannatos, Saturday's program was the orchestra's fourth and last of the summer — Schubert's B-Flat major Symphony (No. 5), and the first and third sections of Debussy's "La Mer."

One cannot cease to be amazed at the polish and poise with which these young musicians attack the formidable problems inherent in such works, and the splendid quality of total sound they already produce. On this evidence, there is great hope for a rising generation of well trained, proficient instrumentalists. Indeed, this summer there are 17 former members of the Boston University Institute who have graduated into the Berkshire Music Center's Fellowship program at Tanglewood — which means more young musicians further on their way.

L. Sn.

Music Review

Young Artists Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE YOUNG ARTISTS orchestra of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, James Yannatos, conductor, gave its second concert Saturday afternoon in the Theatre Concert Hall. They played Brahms, Haydn and Stravinsky and, although the members of the orchestra are all only 17 years old or younger, little if any compromise was necessary to enjoy their demanding program.

Probably the first distinction which becomes apparent is the security of the various sections. This is undoubtedly due to the training Yannatos imparts to them, but they participate with as much strength and confidence in the last stand of the violins and cellos, as seen from the audience, as in the first desks.

* * *

AN ORCHESTRA of a caliber a degree less than professional is apt to play without contrasts of dynamics, but not so Yannatos' charges. They might have made the note values of the initial two notes of the Haydn Variations more accurate and been a little less rigid in tempo, but they were assuredly on the verge of maturity. The violas were allowed to sound through in the lovely siciliano and details of excellence were apparent all the afternoon.

For the Haydn Sinfonia Concertante in B Major, Opus 64, four soloists stepped forward from the ranks: Roger Cole, oboe; Nancy Goeres, bassoon; Udo Hildebrandt, violin; and Walter Gray, cello. They gave a thoroughly sensitive execution of the pleasant three movements. The program closed with Stravinsky's symphony in three movements, of 1945.

The members of this orchestra are selected from all over the country and represent a stratum of our musical education and culture which is most reassuring. The conditions under which they work at Tanglewood, and the faculty to whom they are assigned, are both of a character to move these embryo artists along at a fast and firm pace. Saturday's program was proof enough.

112

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

Lukas Foss chalks the "fight" in the background.

? Music ? Review

Our Reviewer Covers a (?) WHAT (?)

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THERE IS one specific word which describes the evening in the Tent at Tanglewood for which Lukas Foss was toastmaster last night. It escapes me for the moment, but it will return, I am sure, before we close.

Foss designated his ploy as MAP, a musical game, and it was delightful sophisticated nonsense.

* * *

I WISH I could think of that word.

* * *

THERE WERE a few places for some of the large audience to sit down, but everyone else willingly and happily draped themselves on the grass, both within and without the arena. The stage setting was a combination of boxing ring and auction sale. The performers responded to their trainer's prescriptions with a spirit difficult to ascertain. Whether it was docile or constrained was not patently detectable.

* * *

I BEGIN to recall where I heard that elusive word last and who used it. It was some kind of a fertilizer, it seems, maybe a sort of Fossphate.

* * *

THE GAME was to make the piece of music happen. The participants, one for each type of instrument, employed an aleatory system; that is, they resorted to sound sequences played at random and arrived at by chance, as by throwing dice. But it wasn't dice that Foss threw.

OH DEAR! What was that word?

* * *

IN ANY case, it was highly amusing, although I am not able to render a complete report as I was not able to hear the entire evening and thus cannot render a verdict on Foss' fate.

* * *

AH! I'm getting closer. That fugitive word was used several times by the lovely girl in the movie "Love Story." Well, I'll have to give up. It's exasperating, though, isn't it?

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 7 1971 New England Newsclip

Musical Boxing Match Tonight

MAP, a musical game fashioned after a boxing match, will be presented tonight at 8:30 by composer-conductor Lukas Foss and the Berkshire Music Center in the Tanglewood Tent. The composition was written by Foss and is an acronym for Musicians at Play.

Win Instruments

The concert will be presented in-the-round with four musicians occupying separate areas on stage. Each musician will be equipped with a tape recorder and loud speaker in addition to his regular instruments, and the object of the game will be for one player to win all the instruments. The concert will be divided into 12 "rounds." During each round three players will invade the fourth player's "ring" in an effort to "knock-him-out" musically. The winner of each round gets to keep the loser's instruments, and the process continues until one player has captured all the instruments or until three of the players have disqualified themselves by losing three consecutive rounds.

The competing musicians in tonight's match are Paul Zukofsky, bowed instruments; Jim Fulkinson, brass instruments; Jan Williams, percussion instruments; and Ed Flower, plucked instruments.

Foss will act as referee and explain further the rules of the game.

The concert is open to the Friends of Tanglewood and the public.

SUNDAY CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
S. 9,100

JUL 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Boy Choir To Sing In Bridgeport

The Berkshire Boy Choir, which will sing at the opening concerts of the John F. Kennedy Performing Arts Center in Washington, D.C. this fall, will perform at the United Congregational Church, corner of Park Avenue and State Street, Bridgeport, at 8 p.m. on Thursday, July 22.

The concert, which is open to the public at a nominal charge is sponsored by the Kodaly Musical Training Institute (Wellesley, Mass.) which is conducting a four week graduate course for over 100 participants at the University of Bridgeport through July 31.

Other concerts scheduled by the institute will take place in the Alumni Hall Student Center on the UB campus and are open to the public without charge.

Two young pianists, past winners of the New Haven Symphony annual contest, will perform on July 20 at 8:30 p.m.: Miss Oresta Cybriwsky of New Haven, and Kiyoshi Tamagawa of North Haven. Their program will include works by Domenico Scarlatti, J.S.Bach, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Frederic Chopin and Alan Hovhaness.

On July 23 at 8:30 Cynthia Jolly, a soprano who has performed throughout Europe and the United States, will sing selections by Henry Purcell, Bela Bartok, Franz Liszt, Zoltan Kodaly and Benjamin Britten among others.

An Elite Group

The Berkshire Boy Choir, under the direction of Allan Wicks, organist and master of choristers of Canterbury Cathedral, England, is an elite group of 43 boys, selected from across the United States by competitive auditions to sing together for 8 weeks each summer with an adult complement of 16 professional men singers.

These boys, as soloists in their home town choirs, have sung with the Metropolitan Opera, the New York City Opera, and many national symphony orchestras. Later this summer the Choir will also sing with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga.

This remarkable group of youngsters, age 10 to 13, are based at Amherst College in Amherst, Mass., where they rehearse four hours every day when not on tour.

In the past five years 9 choristers from Trinity Church, Southport, have won places in the Choir, and James Cutter of Westport and Stewart Day of Fairfield are members of this summer's group.

The group has been cited by The New York Times as "the best choir of its kind in the country."

"We are delighted to give our participants and the community the opportunity to hear this nationally acclaimed group," said Miss Denise Bacon, musical and educational director of the Wellesley institute, which bases its teaching on the method created by the late Hungarian composer, Zoltan Kodaly.

Kodaly Method

The Kodaly method is based on a singing approach, teaching children to hear and feel melodically and rhythmically, and eventually to read and understand music as easily as their mother tongue, Dr. Harry R. Valante, chairman of the UB music department, explained.

The system originally became internationally known through student and foreign exchange programs and is rapidly becoming an important method of teaching music in elementary schools throughout the United States, Dr. Valante noted. The UB music department has sponsored Kodaly method work shops since 1969.

Participants in the summer course at UB include enrollees from Austria, Switzerland, Hungary, England, Australia, Canada and the Virgin Islands as well as from the United States, according to Dr. Nick Rossi, professor in the UB music department and resident coordinator for the institute.

The Westport News
Westport, Conn.

JUL 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Boy Choir to give concert July 22

The Berkshire Boy Choir, cited by the New York Times as "the best choir of its kind in the country," under the direction of Allan Wicks, organist and master of choristers of Canterbury Cathedral, England, will perform at the United Congregational Church, corner of Park Avenue and State Street, Bridgeport, Thursday, July 22, at 8 p.m., in a concert sponsored by the Kodaly Musical Training Institute, in residence at the University of Bridgeport through July 31.

The Berkshire Boy Choir is an elite group of 43 boys, selected from across the United States by competitive auditions to sing together for 8 weeks each summer with an adult complement of 16 professional men singers.

These boys, as soloists in their home town choirs, have sung with the Metropolitan Opera, the New York City Opera, and many national symphony orchestras.

Later this summer the choir will sing with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga, and in September at the opening concerts of the John F. Kennedy Performing Arts Center in Washington, D.C.

This group of youngsters, age 10 to 13, are based at Amherst College in Amherst, Mass., where they rehearse four hours every day when not on tour. In the past five years nine choristers from Trinity Church, Southport, have won places in the choir, and James Cutter of Westport and Stewart Day of Fairfield are members of this summer's group.

Tickets will be available at the door at $3 and $1 for children.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,034

AUG 6 1971

Boy Sopranos

Tuesday night's program in the Canfield Casino draws the musical ear to the world of boys' choir. The Philadelphia Musical Academy Boys' Choir, holding its summer institute on the Skidmore campus, will give its first public appearance of the session Aug. 10.

For a double take on names, how about Engelbert Humperdinck, the original, "Hansel and Gretel," to be sung by the PMA Boys' Choir at Skidmore Aug. 13? WMHT plans to tape it. (The Johnny-come-lately E. H. is booked for Aug. 22 at SPAC.)

The Berkshire Boys' Choir will sing Aug. 21 at SPAC, with famous bass-baritone Norman Treigle and the Saratoga Potsdam Chorus, as Julius Rudel conducts work by Glinka, Tschaikovsky Moussourgsky, Rossini and Boito.

The Berkshire Boys' Choir also sings at Tanglewood. Based for eight summer weeks at Amherst, 43 singers range from 10 to 13 in age, with sixteen young men in the lower voice parts. By Nancy Curran

Master of choristers at the Cantebury Cathedral in England, Allan Wicks, trains the choir. John Hoyt Stookey is the Stowe School president determined to preserve the art of choir singing through the Berkshire group.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
SUN REPORTER
W. 8,561 (N)

JUL 31 1971

music ★★ ★★ media

by evelyn williams

THE MAESTRO, Leonard Bernstein, is one of the warmest men I have ever met. Luckily, we have a mutual admiration for each other. To sit next to this man, during one of our Celebrations at Glide, and feel his vibrations and sensitivity to the total environment was a special privilege of mine. His social awareness, his revolutionary outlook, his strong statements concerning change convinced many people of his human-ness. I was not at all shocked to hear that he and his wife have literally been persecuted for a year and a half because of the benefit held at their house for the Black Panther Party. In spite of this persecution, they continue to expose their home to the dynamic, revolutionary movements of the day. Mr. Bernstein is a very open man and is eager to know everything about our AMERICA in which we all live. We need many, many more of his kind.

News comes from Tanglewood concerning the 1971 Berkshire Music Center Conducting Fellows. For the second season, the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood for the advanced study of music continues in cooperation with the National Orchestral Association to offer an expanded Fellowship program for gifted young conductors. Philip Kelsey, John Mauceri, Thomas Michalak and Paul Polivnick are the 1971 Conducting Fellows.

Co-ordinated by Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the conducting program involves training in conducting techniques as well as conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and other instrumental and vocal ensembles from the Center's Fellowship Program. The Fellows enrolled will work under the close supervision of Mr. Thomas, with the advice and participation of Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, Leonard Bernstein, William Steinberg, Colin Davis and Bruno Maderna. Repertoire will be drawn from many different composers, styles, and instrumental ensembles. The biographical data of the conducting Fellows show a cross-section of cultural backgrounds and training. New York City, Krakow, Poland, Atlantic City, New Jersey, and San Francisco being the homes of the young men. San Francisco Conservatory of Music, Yale University, Warsaw Musical Academy and the Julliard School of Music being the schools that offered them their basic training.

George Goodman, bass baritone and Sylvia Lee gave two very excellent offerings on last Sunday. The first was to a standing ovation at Glide Celebration and the next to an intimate group who literally moved their chairs to the stage of the Greek Theatre on the Berkeley Campus. The thunderous applause given Mr. Goodman and Mrs. Lee on that morning must've inspired them to continue their superb performance in the afternoon. The audience in the afternoon was scarcely enough to form an appreciative group for the very high caliber people who performed. Where were the people and why weren't they there? This again raises a very serious question as to where one places his efforts; energies and talents at this time in which we live. Is self-satisfaction enough? Which culture shall we perpetuate?

The fabled "Dizzy Gillespie," his trumpet, and his quintet, headlined the second trio of Pops concerts at the Civic Auditorium last week in the current Art Commission series with guest conductor Arthur Fiedler and the San Francisco Symphony. The Pops moves inot its third week still playing to sell-out audiences. Arthur Fiedler programmed a series of delightful bits of music in keeping with Gillespie's unusual contribution. There were three Leroy Anderson tunes, including "Bugler's Holiday" and "Syncopated Clock," Roger's "Slaughter On Tenth Avenue," a pair of Glenn Miller hits, etc. The quintet ended the program unaccompanied and playing whatever came naturally, then a final jazz piece together with orchestra written by comedian Bill Cosby.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 40,129

JUL 25 1971

New England Newsclip

Berkshire awards many conducting fellowships

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — Awarded conducting fellowships at the Berkshire Music Center for the 1971 season were Philip Kelsey, John Mauceri, Thomas Michalak, and Paul Polivnick.

Associate Conducting Fellows include, Charles Darden and John DeMain. Conducting auditors are Robert Frisbie, Robert Kogan and John Neschling.

This marks the second season at the Berkshire Music Center that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood is in session. The academy was created for those qualified for advanced study. This is in cooperation with the National Orchestral Association.

Co-ordinated by Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the conducting program involves training in conducting techniques as well as conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and other instrumental and vocal ensembles from the center's fellowship program.

The Fellows enrolled will work under the close supervision of Mr. Thomas, with the advice and participation of Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, Leonard Bernstein, William Steinberg, Colin Davis and Bruno Maderna.

Repertoire will be drawn from many different composers, styles and instrumental ensembles.

Music theater will be on a regular basis at the Berkshire Music Center during the 1971 season. Performances are being held in the newly re-designed restructured West Barn. Partial support has been received from the National Opera Institute, Washington, D.C. Directing is Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the department of opera at the New England Conservatory of Music. He is being assisted by Martin Smith, music supervisor of N.E.T. Opera who will act as chief coach, and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater who will serve as stage designer.

Five musical stage productions representing different periods are part of the seasonal activity. One will be Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata "Socrates". Texts from Socratic dialogues have been written into the piece. The performance of this score will be a rare event in this country's world of the musical stage. It will be sung in English.

Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By the Greenwood Side" which was commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theater Ensemble of London will be performed. The score is a grotesque parody of traditional pantomime. "Avantures Et Nouvelles Aventures" by the Hungarian born Gyorgi Ligeti is a two part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words. The planned presentation will be an east coast premiere.

Jacques Offenbach has always enjoyed tremendous popularity in this country. His music is associated with hit-vehicles and one of his really enjoyable contributions to the world of the footlights is "Croquefer" which is a one act operetta written in 1857. America will be seeing this stage vehicle for the first time.

The fifth production will be Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel." It will be sung in the original German. This version was written by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The Music Theater Project's performing group includes twelve singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Conducting Fellows of the Center will participate.

WARREN, OHIO
TRIBUNE CHRONICLE
D. 40,000

JUL 6 1971

John DeMain, Area Conductor, Gets Fellowship

John Lee DeMain, Youngstown, was selected for the fellowship program for gifted young composers at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood, Mass.

The talented area musician, son of Mr. and Mrs. Dominic P. DeMain, 4240 Southern Blvd., is well known as a musical conductor for the Kenley Players and last summer directed "The Man From LaMancha" starring Giorgio Tozzi.

The Music Center program, in which DeMain will participate, involves training in conducting techniques as well as conducting experience with the Berkshire Orchestra and other instrumental and vocal ensembles from the center's fellowship classes.

DeMain is assistant conductor of the San Francisco Opera and assistant conductor for the National Educational Television Opera Project. He holds a bachelor of music and master of science degrees from the Julliard School of Music.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 1 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Center Fellows Announced

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, in cooperation with the National Orchestral Association, has announced the conducting fellows for the second season of the program.

The young conductors, who will work closely with Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are Philip Kelsey, John Mauceri, Thomas Michalak and Paul Polivnick. Charles Darden and John DeMain will be associate conductors, and Robert Frisbie, Robert Kogan and John Neschling, conducting auditors.

114

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,009 SUN. 443,090

AUG 31 1971

Dedication Marks Life of Teen Musician

By JO WERNE
Herald Staff Writer

The life of a young musician is totally unlike that of his peers. "Typical teenager" cannot be applied to a 19-year-old whose life revolves around lessons, hours of daily practice, numerous orchestra rehearsals, and the constant hope of one day achieving a good position in a major orchestra.

Here is a "portrait" of one of Miami's young musicians, violinist Terri Sternberg.

In romantic novels about artists, the painter or musician usually lives in a chilly garret, his hunger forgotten in his intense dedication to his art.

Terri Sternberg wouldn't fit this description. This young musician lives in a comfortable West Miami home with her parents. She wears pretty clothes, has her own car, and studies the violin while pursuing a bachelor's degree in music on a full scholarship.

BUT DEDICATION to her art is as much a part of 19-year-old Terri's life as it is in fiction. Though she hides her earnestness under a cool, slightly aloof exterior and a "it's no big deal" shrug of the shoulders.

"My life may seem unusual to others, but to me it's a very normal existence," said Terri, a tall girl with big brown eyes, black hair, and a charming smile that's slow to come but genuine when it does.

Terri's "normal" life includes studying full time at the University of Miami, playing in three professional orchestras — the Miami Philharmonic, the Fort Lauderdale Symphony, and the North Miami Beach Symphony — and the UM Symphony of which she was concertmistress last year.

IN HER STRAIGHT FORWARD manner, Terri said she was "not a prodigy, but was better than the average kid" in her music lessons. She began piano lessons at nine, and played in her first recital at 11.

"I remember that I was the only one who played a classical piece," she said. Then with a slow smile: "I was the star of the show."

At 11, she began playing the violin in the junior high school orchestra. "I chose the violin because it would give me more opportunity to play in an orchestra. There just aren't many works that call for piano. And by this time I knew that I wanted to play in an orchestra."

Terri said she didn't inherit her musical talent, since neither of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace D. Sternberg of 6316 SW 15th St., have studied music.

A MECHANIC, Sternberg is supervisor of maintenance for the city of West Miami and Mrs. Sternberg, formerly a hairdresser, chose to be a full time housewife and mother while Terri was growing up.

Although her parents reminded her to practice, they didn't push her toward a career in music, said Terri. "If they had, I probably would not have decided on music."

At 12, Terri had to make a choice between the piano and violin, since there was not time, energy or money for lessons in both. She chose the violin, and began practicing several hours a day.

By the time she was 16, Terri was beginning the frantic schedule of rehearsals and concerts that would become "normal" to her. She played in the Coral Park Senior High School Orchestra, the All-Miami Youth Symphony, and the Young Artists' Baroque Society Orchestra, serving as concertmistress of all three.

WHEN SHE REACHED her 17th birthday, she auditioned for the Philharmonic "not really expecting to be accepted." She was accepted and became the youngest member of the orchestra.

Terri sits in the last chair of the second violin section "between the percussion and the piccolo."

"You don't sit in the very last chair, do you dear?" her mother interjected anxiously.

"Yes, the very last chair." Later, Terri said: "I don't believe in building myself up or tearing myself down. I just tell what I've done and what I'm doing and leave it at that."

ALTHOUGH Terri considers her position in the Philharmonic an honored one — "not everyone can sit in the last chair" — she "loves leading a section . . . I don't like to be a follower in bowing."

Yet she's content to be a follower for as many years as it takes to get the experience needed to become concertmistress of a major orchestra. This is her goal. But realistically, Terri said her world wouldn't crumble if she didn't make it.

"I think every musician should work toward becoming a soloist, if only because it makes you a better musician. But if everyone wanted to be soloist, or concertmaster, there wouldn't be anyone to sit in the orchestra," she said.

WHEN the winter concert season is in full swing, Terri runs from class to rehearsal to concert with rarely any free time for social life. She remembers one week last season when she played eight concerts and attended 10 rehearsals.

Almost without exception, her friends are musicians. If they're not performing, they go to concerts. She rarely sees a movie, and shuns college social life, especially the big dances, as "a boring waste of time."

She rarely dates. "I'm not too interested in dating right now. As for marriage, it's so far off that I don't think about it. I can't see myself married, but if I do, it won't be until I'm in my 30s," she said.

TERRI does some studying backstage during concert intermissions, and catches up with term papers and reading on weekends. Her recreation tends to be light — ping-pong, frisbee, sunbathing — and her reading heavy — philosophy.

"I enjoy reading philosophy because it helps you understand yourself," she said. "A musician has to be introspective. You have to portray what's inside you and you can't do this until you know what is inside you."

TERRI STUDIES with former Boston Symphony concertmaster George Zazofsky at the University of Miami. Earlier this summer she became the first student to receive a $500 scholarship given by Evelyn Spitalny in honor of her late husband Phil Spitalny, conductor, composer and clarinetist who died in 1970 in Miami. The rest of her tuition is paid by a university scholarship.

She's also won summer scholarships to music festivals — once to the Saratoga, N.Y., Performing Arts Center string congress, and twice to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

TERRI AUDITIONED for Tanglewood by sending a tape recording of her playing. "You had to be 18 and have had two years of college to be eligible, but I was allowed in even though I was 17 and had had just one year of college. I always seem to slip in under the wire."

This past summer, Terri had the exciting — if unnerving — experience of finding conductor-composer Leonard Bernstein watching her during a rehearsal.

Sounding for a brief moment like a typical teenager, Terri said of that experience: "I nearly freaked out!"

TERRI, center, was unnerved to find New York Philharmonic conductor Leonard Bernstein watching her during rehearsal at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Mass., this summer.

—Herald Staff Photo by JOHN PINEDA

TERRY STERNBERG began her musical training with piano lessons at age 9. At 11, she began the violin, confident even then that she would have a career in music.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 165,925

SEP 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Dinerstein Named To Hartt Faculty

Boss Symphony

The appointment of Norman Dinerstein to the theory and composition faculty of Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford, has been announced by president A.M. Woodruff.

Dinerstein has been a member of the New England Conservatory of Music faculty since 1968. He taught at Princeton University and at Hartt, where he earned his master of music degree in 1963. He holds a bachelor's degree from Boston University and a master of fine arts degree from Princeton.

He studied at Tanglewood, and was a Fulbright scholar in Berlin and a Fulbright fellow in Argentina. His awards include the Koussevitzky composition and Sagalyn orchestral awards at Tanglewood, two Ford Foundation grants, and a composer's grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.
SEMI-WEEKLY 10,000

AUG 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Jean Beasley plays with Young Artists

Jean Beasley, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Albert Beasley, 272 Bayberry Lane, is one of 75 high school musicians praticipating in Boston University's Young Artist Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox. Mass.

Miss Beasley, a flutist, will attend Princeton University in the fall. She previously performed as a member of the All-State Orchestra and American Youth Performs.

The Young Artist Program is an eight-week session of performance and study for outstanding high school musicians from all over America. The Young Artists have the opportunity to study privately with members of the Boston University faculty and personnel from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, the Young Artists are members of the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, conducted by James Yannatos of the Harvard music faculty, and perform in small ensemble and chamber groups.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY

FEB 1971

Violinist Ruth Posselt, artist-in-residence at Florida State University for the past six years, will also add to her duties those of Professor of Violin. She will participate in the Bartok Festival this month performing the Sonata No. 2 with Dr. John Boda, pianist. Besides her regular series of concerts as violinist in the Florestan Quartet, she will solo in the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto with orchestra conducted by Dr. Richard Burgin in Opperman Music Hall. Miss Posselt gave the first performance of this work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood with Dr. Burgin conducting. Following this, she played it at Symphony Hall in Boston at three Boston Symphony concerts.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
ROSEVILLE SUBURBAN SUN
W. 10,226

JUL 7 1971

Miss Sigford Awarded Music Scholarship

Kristin Elizabeth Sigford, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. K.J. Sigford, 1987 Beacon, Roseville, a 1971 honor graduate from Alexander Ramsey, has again been awarded a scholarship to return for the third year to the Tanglewood Young Artists Program of the Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, Mass.

The festival is jointly sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston University, and the New England Conservatory.

A violinist, Miss Sigford has been a student of Lea Foli, concertmaster of the Minnesota Orchestra. She has been active in many music organizations in the twin cities including having served four years as concertmistress of the St. Paul Philharmonic Society, the MacPhail Center Young Peoples' Orchestra, as well as various Roseville school orchestras.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 352,000 SUN. 443,000

AUG 31 1971 Buffalo

Dedication Marks Life of Teen Musician

By JO WERNE
Herald Staff Writer

In romantic novels about artists, the painter or musician usually lives in a chilly garret, his hunger forgotten in his intense dedication to his art.

Terri Sternberg wouldn't fit this description. This young musician lives in a comfortable West Miami home with her parents. She wears pretty clothes, has her own car, and studies the violin while pursuing a bachelor's degree in music on a full scholarship.

BUT DEDICATION to her art is as much a part of 19-year-old Terri's life as it is in fiction. Though she hides her earnestness under a cool, slightly aloof exterior and a "it's no big deal" shrug of the shoulders.

"My life may seem unusual to others, but to me it's a very normal existence," said Terri, a tall girl with big brown eyes, black hair, and a charming smile that's slow to come but genuine when it does.

Terri's "normal" life includes studying full time at the University of Miami, playing in three professional orchestras — the Miami Philharmonic, the Fort Lauderdale Symphony, and the North Miami Beach Symphony — and the UM Symphony of which she was concertmistress last year.

IN HER STRAIGHT FORWARD manner, Terri said she was "not a prodigy, but was better than the average kid" in her music lessons. She began piano lessons at nine, and played in her first recital at 11.

The life of a young musician is totally unlike that of his peers. "Typical teenager" cannot be applied to a 19-year-old whose life revolves around lessons, hours of daily practice, numerous orchestra rehearsals, and the constant hope of one day achieving a good position in a major orchestra.

Here is a "portrait" of one of Miami's young musicians, violinist Terri Sternberg.

"I remember that I was the only one who played a classical piece," she said. Then with a slow smile: "I was the star of the show."

At 11, she began playing the violin in the junior high school orchestra. "I chose the violin because it would give me more opportunity to play in an orchestra. There just aren't many works that call for piano. And by this time I knew that I wanted to play in an orchestra."

Terri said she didn't inherit her musical talent, since neither of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace D. Sternberg of 6316 SW 15th St., have studied music.

A MECHANIC, Sternberg is supervisor of maintenance for the city of West Miami and Mrs. Sternberg, formerly a hairdresser, chose to be a full time housewife and mother while Terri was growing up.

Although her parents reminded her to practice, they didn't push her toward a career in music, said Terri. "If they had, I probably would not have decided on music."

At 12, Terri had to make a choice between the piano and violin, since there was not time, energy or money for lessons in both. She chose the violin, and began practicing several hours a day.

By the time she was 16, Terri was beginning the frantic schedule of rehearsals and concerts that would become "normal" to her. She played in the Coral Park Senior High School Orchestra, the All-Miami Youth Symphony, and the Young Artists' Baroque Society Orchestra, serving as concertmistress of all three.

WHEN SHE REACHED her 17th birthday, she auditioned for the Philharmonic "not really expecting to be accepted." She was accepted and became the youngest member of the orchestra.

Terri sits in the last chair of the second violin section "between the percussion and the piccolo."

"You don't sit in the very last chair, do you dear?" her mother interjected anxiously.

"Yes, the very last chair." Later, Terri said: "I don't believe in building myself up or tearing myself down. I just tell what I've done and what I'm doing and leave it at that."

ALTHOUGH Terri considers her position in the Philharmonic an honored one — "not everyone can sit in the last chair" — she "loves leading a section . . . I don't like to be a follower in bowing."

Yet she's content to be a follower for as many years as it takes to get the experience needed to become concertmistress of a major orchestra. This is her goal. But realistically, Terri said her world wouldn't crumble if she didn't make it.

"I think every musician should work toward becoming a soloist, if only because it makes you a better musician. But if everyone wanted to be soloist, or concertmaster, there wouldn't be anyone to sit in the orchestra," she said.

WHEN the winter concert season is in full swing, Terri runs from class to rehearsal to concert with rarely any free time for social life. She remembers one week last season when she played eight concerts and attended 10 rehearsals.

Almost without exception, her friends are musicians. If they're not performing, they go to concerts. She rarely sees a movie, and shuns college social life, especially the big dances, as "a boring waste of time."

She rarely dates. "I'm not too interested in dating right now. As for marriage, it's so far off that I don't think about it. I can't see myself married, but if I do, it won't be until I'm in my 30s," she said.

TERRI does some studying backstage during concert intermissions, and catches up with term papers and reading on weekends. Her recreation tends to be light — ping-pong, frisbee, sunbathing — and her reading heavy — philosophy.

"I enjoy reading philosophy because it helps you understand yourself," she said. "A musician has to be introspective. You have to portray what's inside you and you can't do this until you know what is inside you."

TERRI STUDIES with former Boston Symphony concertmaster George Zazofsky at the University of Miami. Earlier this summer she became the first student to receive a $500 scholarship given by Evelyn Spitalny in honor of her late husband Phil Spitalny, conductor, composer and clarinetist who died in 1970 in Miami. The rest of her tuition is paid by a university scholarship.

She's also won summer scholarships to music festivals — once to the Saratoga, N.Y., Performing Arts Center string congress, and twice to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

TERRI AUDITIONED for Tanglewood by sending a tape recording of her playing. "You had to be 18 and have had two years of college to be eligible, but I was allowed in even though I was 17 and had had just one year of college. I always seem to slip in under the wire."

This past summer, Terri had the exciting — if unnerving — experience of finding conductor-composer Leonard Bernstein watching her during a rehearsal.

Sounding for a brief moment like a typical teenager, Terri said of that experience: "I nearly freaked out!"

TERRI, center, was unnerved to find New York Philharmonic conductor Leonard Bernstein watching her during rehearsal at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Mass., this summer.

—Herald Staff Photo by JOHN PINEDA

TERRY STERNBERG began her musical training with piano lessons at age 9. At 11, she began the violin, confident even then that she would have a career in music.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 165,925

SEP 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Dinerstein Named To Hartt Faculty

The appointment of Norman Dinerstein to the theory and composition faculty of Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford, has been announced by president A.M. Woodruff.

Dinerstein has been a member of the New England Conservatory of Music faculty since 1968. He taught at Princeton University and at Hartt, where he earned his master of music degree in 1963. He holds a bachelor's degree from Boston University and a master of fine arts degree from Princeton.

He studied at Tanglewood, and was a Fulbright scholar in Berlin and a Fulbright fellow in Argentina. His awards include the Koussevitzky composition and Sagalyn orchestral awards at Tanglewood, two Ford Foundation grants, and a composer's grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

WESTPORT NEWS
WESTPORT, CONN.

AUG 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Jean Beasley plays with Young Artists

Jean Beasley, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Albert Beasley, 272 Bayberry Lane, is one of 75 high school musicians praticipating in Boston University's Young Artist Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox. Mass.

Miss Beasley, a flutist, will attend Princeton University in the fall. She previously performed as a member of the All-State Orchestra and American Youth Performs.

The Young Artist Program is an eight-week session of performance and study for outstanding high school musicians from all over America. The Young Artists have the opportunity to study privately with members of the Boston University faculty and personnel from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, the Young Artists are members of the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, conducted by James Yannatos of the Harvard music faculty, and perform in small ensemble and chamber groups.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N.J.
MONTHLY

FEB

Violinist Ruth Posselt, artist-in-residence at Florida State University for the past six years, will also add to her duties those of Professor of Violin. She will participate in the Bartok Festival this month performing the Sonata No. 2 with Dr. John Boda, pianist. Besides her regular series of concerts as violinist in the Florestan Quartet, she will solo in the Khatchaturian Violin Concerto with orchestra conducted by Dr. Richard Burgin in Opperman Music Hall. Miss Posselt gave the first performance of this work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood with Dr. Burgin conducting. Following this, she played it at Symphony Hall in Boston at three Boston Symphony concerts.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
ROSEVILLE SUBURBAN SUN
W. 10,226

JUL 7 1971 Buffalo

Miss Sigford Awarded Music Scholarship

Kristin Elizabeth Sigford, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. K.J. Sigford, 1987 Beacon, Roseville, a 1971 honor graduate from Alexander Ramsey, has again been awarded a scholarship to return for the third year to the Tanglewood Young Artists Program of the Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, Mass.

The festival is jointly sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Boston University, and the New England Conservatory.

A violinist, Miss Sigford has been a student of Lea Foli, concertmaster of the Minnesota Orchestra. She has been active in many music organizations in the twin cities including having served four years as concertmistress of the St. Paul Philharmonic Society, the MacPhail Center Young Peoples' Orchestra, as well as various Roseville school orchestras.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
500,118

JUN 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Andrew White ... Musician

By Hollie I. West

Andrew White, oboist in the American Ballet Theatre Orchestra for two years and currently electric bassist with the Fifth Dimension, says he has no problem in making the artistic jump from Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" to Jim Webb's "Up, Up and Away."

"There's idiomatic differences in music, but they're elementary," he says. "All the way from Bach, Beethoven, to John Coltrane and Miles Davis on to the Fifth Dimension and Stevie Wonder, they all do the same thing—make music.

"I remember when I played under Erich Leinsdorf, in a certain section he might holler out, 'Play with some balls.' The Fifth Dimension might say, 'Give us some ummph' and Stevie Wonder might say, 'Do your thing.' All music is the same. I know it's easy to say but hard to do. But I look at music more as notes than emotion. I'm fascinated by how it is put together."

White, 28, is at his Northeast home on vacation from the Fifth Dimension. He spends at least two hours a day practicing oboe and works six nights a week as electric bassist in the band that plays for the musical "Hair" at National Theater.

He also plays alto and tenor saxophones at occasional jazz dates, the last of which was a virtuosic performance of his own and other contemporary jazz pieces in early May at the Corcoran Gallery of Art.

"There's no conflict in what I do," he explains. "Sure, there're different approaches, but I'm a positive thinker. Conflict to me is a negative thing. Scheduling and discipline are the key elements in my life.

"I have time to play all kinds of music because I discipline and schedule my life. That's why I work with the Fifth Dimension. They work eight months a year and that means I have four months off to do my own thing."

White's life has been a series of extreme musical twists. While studying classical music at Howard University (he's a 1964 graduate), he also played jazz six nights a week, leading the JFK Quintet at the Bohemian Caverns. Next came Dartmouth College and John Hay Whitney Fellowships, a Rockefeller Foundation grant to study new music and a Tanglewood Fellowship.

Between 1968 and 1970 he performed with the American Ballet Theatre Orchestra and soul singer Stevie Wonder concurrently.

"I started playing Fender (electric) bass by accident," he recalls. "Stanley Turrentine (the saxophonist) came to town one week back in 1967 and his bass man was late, so I filled in. I didn't know much about the instrument. I still haven't studied it outside what I've taught myself, and I don't practice. I play bass by the law of physics—the shorter the string, the higher the pitch."

White, who has been asked to write a book on electric bass playing, says his success is not based on how he plays the instrument but what he plays on it.

"If I didn't have a well-rounded musical background, I couldn't adapt to any circumstances I play in with rock groups," he says.

White is eager to show interested visitors precise transcriptions of jazz solos he has made over the years, particularly of saxophonist John Coltrane. "Doing this taught me how to develop in my own way," he says. "More jazz musicians would avoid a lot of repetition if they analyzed music this way instead of just listening to it. All they do is steal a few licks (musical phrases) and play cliches."

By Matthew Lewis—The Washington Post

Andrew White: "I have time to play all kinds of music because I discipline and schedule my life"

Montgomery Advertiser
MONTGOMERY, ALA.
D. 62,328 SUN. 82,174

APR 29 1971

Mrs. Eagar To Be Member Of Pro Musica in Boston

Mrs. William H. Eagar Jr. (Judith Ann Lyon) formerly of Montgomery and now a resident of Arlington, Mass., has been chosen to be a member of the Chorus Pro Musica, Boston, Mass. She is also to perform this summer in the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Chorus Pro Musica, conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson, is a twenty year old group which gives performances of secular and sacred music at Boston Symphony Hall, Tanglewood, and Boston area churches. It has several radio and television appearances to its credit and several recordings made with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including "Beethoven's Ninth Symphony" with Leonard Bernstein conducting. They will perform in May at Carnegie Hall in New York.

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, is located on the estate of Nathaniel Hawthorne in the Berkshire Mountains, at Lenox, Mass. Performances there will include Magnificat by Bach; Missa Solemnis by Beethoven; Requiem, in Latin, by Mozart; The Damnation of Faust, in French, by Berlioz; Cantata No. 34, "O Ewiges Feuer, O Ursprung der Liebe", by Bach; and Friede auf Erden, by Arnold Schonberg. Conductors of the Boston Symphony are Michael Tilson Thomas and William Steinberg.

Mrs. Eagar, a mezzo soprano, was one of 50 chosen from 250 auditioning for the Tanglewood Chorus. She taught music and English at Cloverdale Junior High School while a resident of Montgomery. She was also Youth Choir Director at the Episcopal Church of the Ascension and sang in the choir at Trinity Presbyterian Church. Mrs. Eagar is a graduate of the University of Alabama, where she studied music under Miss Sylvia Debenport and graduated with a Bachelor of Music degree. Mr. and Mrs. Eagar moved to Arlington, Mass. from Montgomery in January. Mr. Eagar is Manager of the Customer Service Department and Field Service Engineer for Acoustic Research, Inc., Cambridge, Mass.

Mrs. Eagar is the daughter of Rev. and Mrs. Frank Lyon of Clio and the niece of Dr. Henry Lyon of Montgomery. Mr. Eagar is the son of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Eagar of Montgomery.

MRS. WILLIAM EAGAR

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

APR 21 1971 New England Newsclip

MARY L. VICKREK
. . . harpist

Mary Vickrek To Perform At Carnegie Hall

FRAMINGHAM — Mary Lee Vickrek, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Vickrek Jr. of 7 Ruth Dr. has been selected from more than 60 cities throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico.

This is the sixth annual musical concert of "American Youth Performs" sponsored by American Airlines. There will also be a 120-voice chorus. These groups of young people will be directed by Morton Gould, guest conductor for the May 19 program in Carnegie Hall, New York.

Miss Vickrek, a member of the North High School orchestra, has also played with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony, the Framingham Symphony Orchestra, the Wellesley Symphony Orchestra and the New Hampshire Philharmonic Orchestra.

For the past two years she has represented her school by performing with the Massachusetts Northeastern District Orchestra and the Mass. All-State Symphony Orchestra. Last summer she was accepted at Tanglewood to study harp with Miss Lucille Lawrence of Boston University.

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

JUN 25 1971 New England Newsclip

The home of the Misses Oma and Marion Giles, 20 Crystal st., was the setting for a Choir Supper and Farewell Party for First Congregational Church Organist Michael Smith, who has played the organ for the regular Sunday services of the church in five different sanctuaries. The Smiths, with their three children, Whoppy, 5, Michale, 3, and Peter, 1½, are moving to their new home in Norton this summer.

The group of about 20 guests at the party included the Rev. and Mrs. Clarence Fuller and the Rev. Robert Mitchell. A lovely Holland pewter pitcher was presented to the guest of honor.

Mrs. Smith, Carolyn Friguglietti, is a soprano soloist and also a vocal teacher at MIT. She and her husband performed together at the Symphony Gala held during the winter at the home of the James Mroses, 50 Russet Lane. They enjoy doing recitals together and have developed an informal approach by talking about the texts and background of the songs and about the composers.

In March Miss Friguglietti was the soprano soloist with the Melrose Symphony Orchestra in their performance of Faure's Requiem at Memorial Hall.

She has received an eight-week full-time vocal fellowship at Tanglewood for the summer and will be studying with Phyllis Curtin and Pierre Bernac. She is really excited about her wonderful opportunity!

Melrose is looking forward to hearing both Smiths again soon.

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
D. 10,990

MAY 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Soloist

Julie Charland, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Charland of 572 Main St., will be the cello soloist with the Hartford Youth Orchestra Sun., May 23, at 8 p.m. at Millard Auditorium, University of Hartford.

She is a junior at St. Thomas Aquinas High School in New Britain, and was a soloist in the school's recent program at Welte Hall, Central Connecticut State College. She was first chair cellist for the annual Connecticut All-State Orchestra and represented Connecticut at the Music Educators National Conference in Atlantic City, N. J., in February.

She is the recipient of a scholarship to Tanglewood this summer to participate in the young artist program sponsored by Boston University. At Tanglewood she will be one of 75 students studying and working with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and visiting artists.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER AND NEWS
D. 41,000

MAR 13 1971

English organist in recital

Martin Neary
. . . English organist

Martin Neary, widely known English recitalist and organist of St. Margaret's Church at Westminster, will present an organ recital at 8:30 p.m. Sunday at the Cathedral Church of Christ the King, Kalamazoo.

His program will include works by Bach, Gibbons, Tomkins, Walond, Vierne, Langlais and Buxtehude.

Neary, on his third concert tour of the United States and Canada, was a prizewinner at the 1963 International Organ Festival at St. Albans. He was awarded a Boston Symphony Orchestra scholarship for study at Tanglewood the same year, was a diploma winner of the 1968 International Bach Competition held in Leipzig and, in 1969, was made an honorary fellow of Trinity College of Music in England.

As organist for St. Margaret's, the parish church of the British House of Commons, he has appeared in numerous recitals at Royal Festival and Queen Elizabeth Halls in London and at private musicals at the home of British Prime Minister Edward Heath.

116

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 29,675

MAY 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Workshop Slated On Black Culture

A workshop seminar on black history, art and music will be sponsored by the Early Childhood Education Program, Department of Education, on Friday, from 4 to 7 p.m. and Saturday 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at Bishop School and again May 14 and May 15, at the same time, at Woodrow Wilson School.

Main speakers for the workshop will be three black experts in their chosen field.

They are Warren Smith, director of African-American Studies and Black Student Affairs at Adelphi University, Garden City, L.I.,; Alvin Makapela, instructor in Afro-American history at the same university, and Frank Smith, a member of the faculty of the Art Department of Howard University, Washington D.C.

The workshops are being conducted to orient both teachers, aides and the community to the importance of black culture and history in relationship to all children.

Smith is presently Director of African-American Studies and Black Student Affairs at Adelphi University, as well as an instructor in Black Studies and Black Music in America.

He received his BS degree in music education from the University of Illinois in 1957 and his M.M. degree from the Manhattan School of Music in 1958. He attended the latter institution on a scholarship and also attended the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Mass., on a scholarship in 1956.

Makepela was born in Johannesburg, South Africa, and has been in the United States for nine years.

He received his degree in sociology from the University of South Africa, his BA in history from Buffalo State University and an MA degree in economics from the New School. He is presently a PhD candidate in economics at the New School and is also a candidate for the same degree in African History at the University of Buffalo.

Makepela taught linguistics in South Africa at the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, in the African Studies Department; was employed for two years at the United Nations as an officer in the African Problems Section; and has also taught Afro-American History in the Newark, N.J. public school system.

Frank Smith, currently a member of the faculty of Howard University, Washington, D.C., where he is teaching black art and black art history, is a native of Chicago, Ill.

He received his BA degree in art education from the University of Illinois and further studied at the Art Institute, Chicago, where he also exhibited many of his works.

Smith taught in the Chicago public school system before moving to New York City in 1957, where he taught in that system for three years.

In addition to giving one-man shows in Chicago and Detroit, his works have been exhibited in Boston, New York and other large cities along the East Coast.

Warren Smith

The Wichita Sunday
Eagle and Beacon
WICHITA, KANS.
SUN. 171,019

SEP 5 1971

THOMAS MICHALAK

Guest Conductor Wins Koussevitsky

Thomas Michalak, guest conductor for the Wichita Symphony's fourth subscription concerts this fall, has just received the Koussevitsky Prize at the Boston Symphony's summer home, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass.

One of the most highly coveted music awards in the world, the Koussevitsky Prize is awarded to the most outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Festival. The prize honors Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony who died in 1951. Although available annually, it is given only when a conductor of extraordinary talent is present. It was not given in 1970.

Previous recipients include Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Claudio Abbado, Lorin Maazel and Michael Tilson-Thomas.

Michalak, who conducts the Utica, N.Y., Symphony and the Ithaca College Orchestra, attended the festival as one of four conducting fellows. He conducted three orchestra concerts and two opera performances.

At his concerts here on Nov. 21 and 22, Michalak has programmed works of Berlioz, Mozart and Prokofieff. With guest violinist Josef Suk, he will conduct the Dvorak Violin Concerto.

FAIRMONT, MINN.
SENTINEL
D. 10,599

AUG 26 1971

Robert Frisbie conducts under watchful eye of Leonard B Bernstein

Fairmonter's son assists in conducting at Boston Symphony's music center

Chicago conductor Robert Frisbie has just completed an eight week period as conducting fellow at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts. During the intensive summer session, he worked with Seijzi Ozawa, Tanglewood's artistic director; Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's musical adviser; Italian conductor-composer Bruno Maderna, and the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. Frisbie conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra as part of his program.

Frisbie, son of Mr. and Mrs. Donald Frisbie of Fairmont, holds a bachelor's degree from St. Olaf College and a master's degree from Stanford. He also has done graduate work at Yale and trained under conductors Robert Shaw and Igor Markevitch.

In 1969 he was assistant conductor of the Ravinia Festival Chorus and in 1968-69 he was assistant conductor of the Chicago Symphony Chorus. He is also founder of the Robert Frisbie Chorale and an assistant professor at Beloit College, DePaul University and the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee. He plans shortly to return to Europe for additional extended study with Igor Markevitch.

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood is maintained by the Boston Symphony for the advanced study of music. Each summer, some of the most gifted professional musicians and advanced students from this country and abroad spend the summer in rehearsal and performance under the guidance of a faculty of Boston Symphony players and distinguished guest teachers and artists. Its conducting program is particularly renowned, since it numbers among its alumni such names as Bernstein, Ozawa, Thomas, Lukas Foss, Zubin Mehta, Thomas Schippers and Lorin Maazel.

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
(E) 30,774

APR 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Cumberland High Clippings

By DAWN McCOSKER

Dominating the musical spotlight last month at CHS has been Dennis Alves, sophomore. Starting with a weeklong convention at Atlantic City, Dennis performed March 1 at the All-Eastern Music Festival. Two other CHS students who also attented this festival were David Martins, clarinetist, and Cynthia Robinshaw, vocalist.

After returning home from Atlantic City, Alves received an offer to attend Tanglewood, a summer music camp, located in the Berkshire Mountains. This camp, sponsored by the Boston University, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To help Dennis with the expenses of Tanglewood he was awarded a check amounting to $100 by Thomas Skahan principal, at the winter concert, March 14 at the Highland Avenue Middle School, where he played with the CHS stage band. The total cost of the eight-week session at Tanglewood is about $1,200. Dennis is groping to receive a partial scholarship from Boston University to help with the expenses.

Dennis has been playing the trumpet for the past eight years. He has played with the Brown University Orchestra, Barrington Orchestra, and the Rhode Island Youth Orchestra. He has also made a number of solo appearances throughout New England, including a spot on the Ted Mack show, when the company was visiting Providence. He is presently with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra.

Although Alves has no definite plans for the future, he feels certain that music will play an important role in his decision. Whatever your decision, Dennis, CHS wishes you the best of luck!

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
D. 10,990

MAY 20 1971 New England Newsclip

Lurene Ekwurtzel, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Ekwurtzel of 121 Southwood Rd., will be a featured soloist at the Newington Choral Club's centennial spring concert Saturday at Martin Kellogg Junior High School.

A junior at Watkinson School in Hartford, she is a student of Mrs. Dorothy Fidlar at Hartt School of Music. She is a member of the Hartt Cello Ensemble and the Greater Hartford Youth Orchestra. She recently played the Saint-Saens Concerto in A Minor at the youth orchestra's winter concert. She is planning to include this number in her spring concert selections. She will attend the young artists program at Tanglewood this summer, and is the recipient of numerous musical awards. She earned the honor musician award last summer at the New England Music Camp and placed third in the National Federation of Musical Clubs scholarship competition.

Accompanied by Stephen Kramer, she will also play Saint-Saens' "The Swan" and Grieg's Cello Sonata in A Minor.

The concert, which will begin promptly at 8:15 p.m. under the direction of Mark Guderian, will also feature vocal soloists Lana Shaw singing "HiLili, HiLo" and Karen Parisi singing "This land is your land." A limited ticket supply will be available at the door. Prices are $1.50 general admission and $1 student. Last minute reservations may be made by calling Ralph Gilbert, president. Photo by Newington Police Department.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,982 SAT. 297,247

APR 1 1971

Pianist Performs, Tells Of Youth Opportunities

By LISA MUEHLBAUER

Aspiring young musicians should avail themselves of opportunities presented by youth competitions and local community symphony organizations, Miss Leslie D. Sixfin told members of the Twentieth Century Club before luncheon Wednesday in the clubrooms on Delaware Ave.

Miss Sixfin, a senior student in Mannes College of Music, New York, performed a portion of the senior piano recital she will give April 30 and described places in which young musicians can be heard and the opportunities available in universities for connecting music with related art.

Drawing from her own musical experiences, the pianist said an interst in ballet prompted her to begin piano studies at the age of 8.

"I grew up in the Long Island area and acquired most of my early experience there," Miss Sixfin related. As a child she studied in the Preparatory Division of Juilliard School of Music.

Young musicians can gain early exposure by performing with local community symphony orchestras, Miss Sixfin said. She explained that she played with a community symphony in Long Island and with the American Symphony Orchestra as a result of neighborhood competition in New York. She also has performed twice with the Mannes Conservatory Orchestra.

* * *

LIMITED FINANCIAL means need not deter a musical aspirant, Miss Sixfin noted, explaining there are music settlements that provide low-cost musical education to students who otherwise couldn't afford it.

Miss Sixfin, who was awarded fellowships in 1969 and 1970 at the Tanglewood Festivals, described her experiences at the Berkshire Music Center "where I was exposed to a lot of chamber music, a lot of modern music and excellent professional musicians.

"Working there with excellent young musicians and professionals helped me to develop a very natural and joyous attitude toward music," she continued.

Miss Sixfin noted she last was in Buffalo in October when she was accompanist for Miss Carol Wincenc, flutist, during a Chromatic Club program.

For her first selection this morning, Miss Sixfin chose the Bach Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue. Taking quotes from "Landowska on Music" by Denise Restout, the pianist explained:

* * *

"THERE ARE many who find in Bach's chromatic fantasy an anticipation of Romanticism. Yet in this rhapsody, rather than fantasy with its fiery recitatives interrupted by chords spread out in a skillfully built disorder, we find the surviving experience and influence of the great French lutenists of the 16th and 17th Centuries."

The artist was presented by the club's Music Committee, with Mrs. Albert C. Olson chairman and Mrs. Lester S. Knapp co-chairman.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
S. 29,099

JUN 29 1971

New England Newsclip

Charles Pikler To Participate At Berkshire

785

NORWICH — Charles R. Pikler, 5 Huntington Pl., a senior at the University of Connecticut, will participate in the eight-week Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass. according to Harry J. Kraut, administrator.

Pikler will return to the session as an Associate Fellow in Violin. His tuition will be underwritten by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sponsor of the annual Western Mass. event.

The program will be staged under the joint artistic directorship of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, with Leonard Bernstein serving as advisor.

It is expected that William Steinberg, Michael Tilson Tomas, Bruno Maderna, Colin Davis, and Leon Barzin will be principal guest teachers in instrumental music, along with the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pikler will participate from June 27 to August 22. The local violinist studied nine years under Ben Ornstein of Norwich, and is presently being tutored by Branislaw Gimpel at UConn.

Conductor challenges concert traditions

Worcester Telegram
July 31, 1971

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

No area of revolution and innovation in our times is more of a boiling cauldron than serious music.

It's personified by one of the accompanying pictures.

John Mauceri is wearing the "Howdy-Doody" shirt. He's holding the baton, the score and the notebook.

The other gentleman in the also lively shirt, "establishment" aged, and immensely respected by the younger generation, is Gunther Schuller. He's president of The New England Conservatory of Music and one of the artistic directors at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

Conducting Fellow

Mauceri is a conducting fellow at the center this summer. The center, by the way, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for advanced musical study.

There are but four full-fledged conducting fellows this summer. This is the second season the Center has offered conducting fellowships which are given in cooperation with the National Orchestral Association.

Only young supermen of the podium make the grade.

Mauceri has already had great success at Yale University where he's a 1972 Ph.D. candidate. Since 1968, he has taken over Yale's podiums — Yale Symphony Orchestra, Greater New Haven Youth Symphony, New Haven Opera, Yale Repertory Orchestra; guest conductor, New Haven Symphony, Yale Collegium Musicum Orchestra.

Now 25, Mauceri hasn't been dawdling.

It doesn't disturb Mauceri that virtually every musical organization in the country is tottering at the edge of a financial precipice.

"I'm not really concerned about it," he says. "I'm young enough, idealistic and perhaps foolish enough to think that we can overcome it."

A familiar phrase.

Photos for the Telegram by WHITESTONE

John Mauceri conducts at a rehearsal.

118

cont'd from preceding page

Mistakes Made

"Mistakes have been made," he goes on to say. "It may be that orchestras and record companies will close, but they're bound to come back."

Mauceri isn't enamoured of the present recording production.

"They keep issuing new recordings of old works, and neglecting the new. Why should I buy still another recording of 'Aida'?"

"Sure, there's a feeling of insecurity among music students but that's true of every field. Many young musicians are reconciled that what they may have to do isn't what they want, but it's a living."

Mauceri has a lot of point-blank opinions about conductors and conducting, and he isn't shy about expressing them.

One has to do with an area that's generally avoided because it would never do to suggest that the choral conductor is a limited creature.

"There shouldn't be orchestral conductors, and choral conductors," he insists. "There should be just conductors."

No Refugee

Mauceri protests the popular notion that the conductor is a refugee from a dwindling instrumental career. It's of significance to some that Koussevitzky played the double bass (Toscanini was a cellist), Ormandy played the violin, Leinsdorf, the piano.

"A conductor is primarily that," says Mauceri. "He may have had some other career, then went into conducting. But he's got to be many things, like master of his scores. He's got to be a superb politician. He must make the orchestra want to play for him.

"I try to make my orchestra love to play. My responsibility is to music, the orchestra and the public. It doesn't matter whether the orchestra primarily loves to play the piece or hates it. I must excite its interest."

Mauceri believes that audiences come to hear soloists rather than the orchestra.

To an idealist in program building, that has severe limitations.

A Mauceri program must have a focal point and some kind of generating idea.

Which makes pretty ludicrous the average group of program "architects" who are primarily motivated by the lengths of compositions and their own personal preferences without concern for public interest.

"Most soloists have highly limited repertories, or at best offer a narrow choice of available works each season," Mauceri declares. "Therefore, it becomes necessary to build a program as best you can around what the soloist is willing to offer."

Mauceri is constantly searching for something new. He certainly hit the jackpot two years ago when he conducted the American premiere of Debussy's "Khama."

The repertory he proposed to conduct this summer at the Berkshire Center under his fellowship status was miles off the beaten path.

Among the 20th century works were the Berg Violin Concerto, Ives' Symphony No. 4, Scriabin's "Prometheus," Debussy's "Music for King Lear," Cage's "Atlas Eclipticalis," and the Shostakovich Cello Concerto.

However, it didn't end there.

"I think a lot of things should change," he said. "The exterior trappings should pass. Why shouldn't we add lights to music, and films? Why shouldn't the strings be heard from offstage if that's the needed effect?"

He does not go along with the idea that the audience should be liberated from its concert hall imprisonment — don't move, don't make a sound, don't applaud until decorum says so!

"Music is to be listened to." Mauceri says. "For that, everyone is entitled to surrounding silence.

"The other day, when the Boston Symphony played Vivaldi's, 'The Seasons,' how much more effective it would have been with a running commentary! The composer even marked on the score what he was describing. But perhaps the orchestra and soloist would have objected . . ."

Defy Critics?

Would Mauceri deliberately repeat a work that had been roasted by critics and management?

"Yes, I would," he replied, "if I felt that the work really needed to be heard. Maybe I would try to find out where I'd failed."

As conductor of the Yale Orchestra, Mauceri has never had to compromise in his choice of repertory to maintain a healthy box-office. His concerts are sell-outs, mostly students who accept new music as a challenge and give it a chance.

"Even so, I try to strike a balance," he says. "I'm one who believes that the Boston Pops concerts are a great idea. Sometimes it pays to sugar the medicine."

In his proposed repertory for this summer, Mauceri included a number of "warhorses."

On paper they looked harmless enough — Herold's "Zampa" Overture, Grieg's "Peer Gynt," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

"If one wished to add a somewhat esoteric work," he wrote, "the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 3 would be a possibility."

But it wasn't quite as obvious as it seemed.

Do the Original

For example, what he hoped for with Tchaikovsky's "Romeo" wasn't the familiar, time-worn version, but the original with two singers — almost never performed.

"Take Moussorgsky's 'Boris'," he says. "Everyone knows the Rimsky-Korsakoff revision. Why not perform Moussorgsky's original? As a matter of fact, I think it's a lot better."

Mauceri takes an ardent interest in observing other conductors, mainly their technique.

"I can learn a lot more from a bad conductor than a good one," he says. "It helps a geat deal to see what you shouldn't do. Everyone finds his own way. Last week, I was amazed to see how Seiji Ozawa uses his left hand."

Not that he's closed the door on rock, but Mauceri is "skeptical" as to what it will contribute to a solid orchestral repertory of the future.

"It will all depend on the interest of a good composer. So far, none has turned up. If a good composer writes a good piece using rock, it will happen. Not otherwise."

Bearing in mind that Mauceri doesn't go along with the idea that conductors are defeated instrumentalists, he says, "Conducting can be taught. But only some people can be conductors."

He would have removed from the scene batonists who are actually conducted by the orchestra and respond like weathervanes in a high wind.

Whoever said it was right:

"A good conductor has the score in his head, and not his head in the score."

John Mauceri, left, and Gunther Schuller

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682

JUL 8 1971

One at School

Students Diminish With Philharmonic

By Joseph Kaye
The Star's New York Correspondent

Lenox, Mass.—The number of students at the Berkshire Music Center from the Kansas City area seems to have dwindled with the weakening of the Kansas City Philharmonic.

LANCE FRITTER

Several years ago, when the Philharmonic was still reasonably flourishing and its Connoisseur Concerts had gained a national reputation, eight or nine students from Missouri and Kansas attended the famed summer music school connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer festival here. The group diminished each year —five, four, three and last year two.

This year there was only one, a fact that coincides with the suspension of the Philharmonic.

The lone student is Lance Fritter of Paola, Kan., who is studying orchestral trumpet. His teacher at the center is the principal trumpeter of the Boston Symphony, Armando Chitalla. Fritter also studies in New York at the Manhattan School of Music where his teacher, William Vacchiano, has a similar post with the New York Philharmonic.

Fritter was introduced to the trumpet in grade school in Paola. He continued his music studies at the University of Kansas and majored in trumpet and orchestra. Before moving East to continue his musical studies he played occasionally with the Kansas City High School Orchestra.

PLYMOUTH, MICH.
MAIL & OBSERVER
TW. 11,842

JUN 19 1971

Trumpet Player Wins Award

Paul Randall of Livonia has been awarded a tuition scholarship to attend the young artists program of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

This program is run by Boston University for talented young musicians of high school age, chosen from all over the U.S., in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Festival offers eight weeks of professional training in orchestra and chamber music beginning June 26.

Paul, who is 15 and a student at Dickinson Junior High School in Livonia, is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Randall of Norwich Road.

He is currently principal trumpet with the Detroit Symphony Youth Orchestra. In past years, he has played first trumpet in the All-State Intermediate Orchestra at Interlochen, the Schoolcraft College Summer School Orchestra, the Livonia Junior Orchestra and the Livonia Youth Wind Ensemble.

His only teacher has been Irving Sarin of Westland, for 17 years first trumpet with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Sarin also played with the Israel Philharmonic and other major orchestras under such distinguished conductors as Fritz Reiner and Leonard Bernstein.

Paul also recently traveled to Pittsburgh where he met and played for William Steinberg, the internationally-known conductor of the Boston Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

PAUL RANDALL

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

AUG 6 1971

New England Newsclip

Scholarship In Music

Michael Coleman of Ashby and Donna Dignard of Leominster stand before the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A special scholarship concert held in Fitchburg by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players provided the funds for the youths to study with the Symphony. Sponsors of the concert were the Fitchburg Rotary Club, the Montachusett Community Concert Association, Fitchburg State College and the Montachusett Association for the Performing Arts.

AT TANGLEWOOD INSTITUTE

She's on the 'band' wagon

Pamela Paikin played under the baton of maestro Morton Gould at the "American Youth Performs" concert in Carnegie Hall.

By NANCY CACIOPPO

For her 17 years, Pam Paikin of Nanuet has achieved as much success musically as some professional musicians do in a lifetime.

The Nanuet High School honor senior, who has been studying music seriously since the seventh grade, earned two of her greatest credits playing last May in a Carnegie Hall "American Youth Performs" concert, and this summer, spending eight weeks steeped in music study at Tanglewood Institute, the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Massachusetts.

The young French horn player hopes to become a professional musician some day, but now her concert appearances and musical experiences are keeping her immersed in busy schedules.

Locally, Pam has been selected to perform as first French horn soloist for the Suburban Symphony's Young People's Concert next March.

She also has participated in the Nanuet High School band, all-county orchestra, and was first-horn player in the Mid-East Band in Pittsburgh and the New York All-State Band at the Concord Hotel.

She belongs to a local woodwind chamber trio and last summer toured five European countries with the Metropolitan Wind Ensemble.

She auditioned for both the Carnegie Hall concert and the Tanglewood youth study program by using a tape recording of her performance with the Mid-East Band.

The National Youth Orchestra and chorus concert at Carnegie Hall climaxed the sixth season of "American Youth Performs" concerts, training ground and showcase for accomplished high school musicians.

Pam was chosen from among 500 young people from 27 states, Canada and Mexico to perform in the 110-piece orchestra.

At Tanglewood, Pam rehearses five hours a day with 90 other young musicians, participates in lessons given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performs in ensemble groups and plays for and attends concerts sponsored by this Boston University summer institute.

OLEAN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD
D. 21,000

JUN 23 1971

Husband Directs Band During Tour Of Europe

OSSINING — A former Salamanca woman and her husband, director of the Ossining High School Band, have recently completed an eight-day tour of Europe with the band members in a presentation of concerts in Holland and Germany.

The former Betty Jane Edmund of Salamanca, and her husband, Roy C. Wilkinson of Ossining, accompanied the 70-piece high school band on the European tour. The band was selected by an organization known as "Concerts Abroad" because of its consistent A-6 ratings in the New York State school music festivals and for the high caliber of performance in school and community programs.

It is believed to be the first New York State high school band to give performances overseas.

THE COST to each member of the band for the overseas trip was $600. The community of Ossining joined in fund raising enterprises to help the students raise money.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilkinson arrived at Amsterdam, Holland, May 27, where the Ossining High School Band presented its first concert the next morning.

TOUR EUROPE. Mr. and Mrs. Roy C. Wilkinson of Ossining have completed a tour of Europe with the Ossining High School Band, which Mr. Wilkinson directs. His wife is the former Betty Jane Edmund of Salamanca.

The following day, they gave a concert at Arnkem, Holland. After their performance in Cologne, Germany, before 5,000 in Tanzbrunnen Park. The audience requested five encores. After the performance, Mr. Wilkinson was presented a bouquet of flowers tied with a large red, white and blue ribbon.

He received a medal after the Arnkem concert, and other musical emblems at Amsterdam.

The final concert was presented at Heidelberg Castle, Heidelberg, Germany.

The band and chaperones traveled by motor coaches to tour Luxembourg, Belgium, before returning to Amsterdam for the air flight back to Kennedy Airport.

MR. WILKINSON received his bachelor of music degree at State University College at Fredonia, did graduate work at Eastman School of Music in Rochester, and also at New York University, where he received his master's degree.

Most recently he took a sabbatical leave from teaching and studied again at New York University, where he completed his studies for his doctorate degree. He was the recipient of a scholarship several years ago at Tanglewood, where he studied conducting under the renowned Serge Koussevitsky. He also has conducted the U.S. Marine Band and West Point Academy Band at concerts.

MRS. WILKINSON is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Edmund, 148 Wilson St., Salamanca. She is an elementary school teacher in Ossining, and is active in music organizations in that city. She and her husband, formerly of Rochester, met while attending Fredonia State Teachers College.

They are parents of two daughters, Mrs. Arthur T. Cranston, a music teacher in Kenmore public schools, where her husband is co-chairman of the English Department at East High School, Kenmore; and Mrs. David Simpson, completing her junior year as a history major at Oklahoma State University at Edmond, Okla. Her husband will graduate in August from the same university with a major in English and journalism.

NYACK, N.Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 29,000

JUL 23 1971

PLYMOUTH, MICH.
MAIL & OBSERVER
TW. 11,842

JUN 19 1971

Trumpet Player Wins Award

Paul Randall of Livonia has been awarded a tuition scholarship to attend the young artists program of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

This program is run by Boston University for talented young musicians of high school age, chosen from all over the U.S., in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Festival offers eight weeks of professional training in orchestra and chamber music beginning June 26.

Paul, who is 15 and a student at Dickinson Junior High School in Livonia, is the son of Mr and Mrs. Leonard Randall of Norwich Road.

He is currently principal trumpet with the Detroit Symphony Youth Orchestra. In past years, he has played first trumpet in the All-State Intermediate Orchestra at Interlochen, the Schoolcraft College Summer School Orchestra, the Livonia Junior Orchestra and the Livonia Youth Wind Ensemble.

His only teacher has been Irving Sarin of Westland, for 17 years first trumpet with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Sarin also played with the Israel Philharmonic and other major orchestras under such distinguished conductors as Fritz Reiner and Leonard Bernstein.

Paul also recently traveled to Pittsburgh where he met and played for William Steinberg, the internationally-known conductor of the Boston Symphony and Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestras.

PAUL RANDALL

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 20,300

AUG 6 1971

New England Newsclip

Scholarship In Music

Michael Coleman of Ashby and Donna Dignard of Leominster stand before the Music Shed at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A special scholarship concert held in Fitchburg by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players provided the funds for the youths to study with the Symphony. Sponsors of the concert were the Fitchburg Rotary Club, the Montachusett Community Concert Association, Fitchburg State College and the Montachusett Association for the Performing Arts.

AT TANGLEWOOD INSTITUTE

She's on the 'band' wagon

Pamela Paikin played under the baton of maestro Morton Gould at the "American Youth Performs" concert in Carnegie Hall.

By NANCY CACIOPPO

For her 17 years, Pam Paikin of Nanuet has achieved as much success musically as some professional musicians do in a lifetime.

The Nanuet High School honor senior, who has been studying music seriously since the seventh grade, earned two of her greatest credits playing last May in a Carnegie Hall "American Youth Performs" concert, and this summer, spending eight weeks steeped in music study at Tanglewood Institute, the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Massachusetts.

The young French horn player hopes to become a professional musician some day, but now her concert appearances and musical experiences are keeping her immersed in busy schedules.

Locally, Pam has been selected to perform as first French horn soloist for the Suburban Symphony's Young People's Concert next March.

She also has participated in the Nanuet High School band, all-county orchestra, and was first-horn player in the Mid-East Band in Pittsburgh and the New York All-State Band at the Concord Hotel.

She belongs to a local woodwind chamber trio and last summer toured five European countries with the Metropolitan Wind Ensemble.

She auditioned for both the Carnegie Hall concert and the Tanglewood youth study program by using a tape recording of her performance with the Mid-East Band.

The National Youth Orchestra and chorus concert at Carnegie Hall climaxed the sixth season of "American Youth Performs" concerts, training ground and showcase for accomplished high school musicians.

Pam was chosen from among 500 young people from 27 states, Canada and Mexico to perform in the 110-piece orchestra.

At Tanglewood, Pam rehearses five hours a day with 90 other young musicians, participates in lessons given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performs in ensemble groups and plays for and attends concerts sponsored by this Boston University summer institute.

OLEAN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD
D. 21,000

JUN 23 1971

Husband Directs Band During Tour Of Europe

OSSINING — A former Salamanca woman and her husband, director of the Ossining High School Band, have recently completed an eight-day tour of Europe with the band members in a presentation of concerts in Holland and Germany.

The former Betty Jane Edmund of Salamanca, and her husband, Roy C. Wilkinson of Ossining, accompanied the 70-piece high school band on the European tour. The band was selected by an organization known as "Concerts Abroad" because of its consistent A-6 ratings in the New York State school music festivals and for the high caliber of performance in school and community programs.

It is believed to be the first New York State high school band to give performances overseas.

THE COST to each member of the band for the overseas trip was $600. The community of Ossining joined in fund raising enterprises to help the students raise money.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilkinson arrived at Amsterdam, Holland, May 27, where the Ossining High School Band presented its first concert the next morning.

TOUR EUROPE. Mr. and Mrs. Roy C. Wilkinson of Ossining have completed a tour of Europe with the Ossining High School Band, which Mr. Wilkinson directs. His wife is the former Betty Jane Edmund of Salamanca.

The following day, they gave a concert at Arnkem, Holland. After their performance in Cologne, Germany, before 5,000 in Tanzbrunnen Park. The audience requested five encores. After the performance, Mr. Wilkinson was presented a bouquet of flowers tied with a large red, white and blue ribbon.

He received a medal after the Arnkem concert, and other musical emblems at Amsterdam.

The final concert was presented at Heidelberg Castle, Heidelberg, Germany.

The band and chaperones traveled by motor coaches to tour Luxembourg, Belgium, before returning to Amsterdam for the air flight back to Kennedy Airport.

MR. WILKINSON received his bachelor of music degree at State University College at Fredonia, did graduate work at Eastman School of Music in Rochester, and also at New York University, where he received his master's degree.

Most recently he took a sabbatical leave from teaching and studied again at New York University, where he completed his studies for his doctorate degree. He was the recipient of a scholarship several years ago at Tanglewood, where he studied conducting under the renowned Serge Koussevitsky. He also has conducted the U.S. Marine Band and West Point Academy Band at concerts.

MRS. WILKINSON is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Edmund, 148 Wilson St., Salamanca. She is an elementary school teacher in Ossining, and is active in music organizations in that city. She and her husband, formerly of Rochester, met while attending Fredonia State Teachers College.

They are parents of two daughters, Mrs. Arthur T. Cranston, a music teacher in Kenmore public schools, where her husband is co-chairman of the English Department at East High School, Kenmore; and Mrs. David Simpson, completing her junior year as a history major at Oklahoma State University at Edmond, Okla. Her husband will graduate in August from the same university with a major in English and journalism.

NYACK, N.Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 29,002

JUL 23 1971

120

—Journal-Bulletin Photo

AS A POTENTIAL artist and a young Jew, Marc Parmet has to try new things.

A Versatile Young Artist

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 149,649

JUL 10 1971

New England Newsclip

By STUART FINE

MARC PARMET, a recent Hope High graduate, is a versatile percussionist, an occasional composer-arranger, a musical director of theatrical productions, and as Leo Durocher would say, "a regular take-charge guy."

During the summer, Marc is providing the powerful, percussive background at Matunick's Theater by the Sea, for the group's production of the record-breaking Broadway sensation, "Fiddler on the Roof." (The play is presented nightly through July 17, with matinees every Wednesday.)

Marc, who has worked with the dramatics crew at Hope and the Pawtucket Community Players, said, "This is the closest thing to professional that I've ever done; I jumped at the opportunity to join them for the summer."

He was student musical director at his high school's most recent theatrical endeavors, "The Love Man" and "The King and I," which were directed by Mrs. Marian B. Strauss.

In September, Marc, a recipient of a scholarship from the Rhode Island Philharmonic Youth Orchestra, will enter the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. He hopes to pursue a career in drumming, but at college, Marc will major in music education.

Despite his varied musical talents in classical music and theater production, Marc has devoted time to the sounds of today.

For the past year, Marc has been the backbone of a brassy, eight-piece, jazz-rock band, Beale Street. Most of the members "are majoring in music." When fall rolls around, the young musicians will be going their own ways, forcing the nifty beat of Beale Street to dissolve.

Despite the unquestionable talent of Beale Street (each member of the rhythm and horn section was selected to an "All-Star" band at Berklee School of Music's annual stage band competition), the band has had trouble marketing its sound. Marc feels the lack of popular appear is due in part to inferior AM programming and limited music courses in public schools.

"Only recently have truly talented jazz-oriented artists like Blood, Sweat and Tears, Chicago, and Chase been included on Top-40 stations," he said. The minimal exposure the young, mass audience has to jazz also has maimed the commercial success of Beal Street, Marc said.

The most extensive musical training Marc has had to date is an eight-week session at Tanglewood, the summer home of Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops. He was awarded a scholarship there last summer from the Fine Arts School of Boston University to study privately under Charles Smith, who was formerly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Students from all over the United States were selected for the institute. They were visited on a regular basis by such acclaimed conductors and musicians as Leonard Bernstein, who spent a day at the institute, and even directed the Young Artists Orchestra. According to the moustached Providence youth, "it was the greatest that I have ever played in my life; he had complete command of all of us."

While at Tanglewood, the young symphony orchestra studied or prepared works by Stravinsky, Beethoven, Bach and Berlioz. The pieces ranged from Debussey's "Iberia" to Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" to Mozart's symphony number 41.

Music has always been a favorite pastime in the Parmet home; Marc's mother has played the piano since she was seven. Marc's interest in the art form began when he was enrolled in the Providence School Department instrumental program.

Since the days of elementary school, Marc's rhythmic abilities have developed. As a junior high student at Nathan Bishop, he was a member of the All-City Band and Orchestra,

As the principal tympanist of Hope's marching band during his sophomore and junior years, he was selected manager of the band, directed by Mary Ellen Dunn. In his senior year, Marc became president of the concert band as well as the marching band.

A member of the congregation of Temple Emanu-El, Marc recently worked with the post-conformation class which rewrote a service for the synogogue "because our generation was not reflected in the service as a whole." Marc arranged the musical accompaniment.

"We wrote contemporary sounding music for the service, which blended with older, but 'Hip' compositions," he said, claiming the effect was dazzling!

The choir was omitted for the service, forcing the congregation to give more of themselves. "We wanted them to get involved.."

A crisp, five-piece brass section, composed of two trumpets, two trombones and a French horn, replaced the conventional singing choir. "Traditional melodies were utilized, but we added modern harmonies with different durations. We wanted the young people to feel somewhat at home." Even a melody from "Chicago 3" was effectively used, "so the kids could relate religion to the chaotic world of the 70s," he explained.

"The innovation went over surprisingly well" he said. "I felt the older people would be offended, but they gave it a chance and were pleased.

"As a potential artist and a Jew, I felt I had to try something new, which would appeal to youth."

Outside of music, Marc's life is equally exciting and eventful. At Hope, he organized a student-faculty senate at the beginning of his senior year. Marc's activities at the Jewish Community Center have been numerous; he had a stint as a counselor at a day camp, was technical director for the Children's Theater, and even gigged as the coordinator for the Israel Anniversary Festivals.

Marc was invited to speak at Lincoln High School concerning "Black-White Interaction in the High School," during the spring of 1970. He was chosen to represent Hope at the American Legion Boys' State, a program dealing with the operations of modern governmental systems. He even made his mark as an athlete in the fall of his sophomore year, when he was a member of the junior varsity cross-country team.

Between thoughts about Schonberg, Stravinsky, Chase and Dave Brubeck, Marc briefly speaks about his future, although he doesn't set goals for himself. "Ultimately, I would like to compose and be able to express my own ideas to the public, and witness their reactions."

STATE COLLEGE AND BELLEFONTE, PA.
CENTRE TIMES
D. 16,000

JUN 28 1971

State College Musician:

Youth To Attend Berkshire Festival

Attending the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood this summer is cellist David Boyle, the son of Mr. and Mrs. J. David Boyle, State College. The Berkshire festival, held in Massachusetts, runs from June 27 to August 26.

Participants in the summer-long festival were chosen by competitive auditions at various locations in the country last winter. Representatives of the festival auditioned Dave in New York in February, and he was accepted and awarded a scholarship.

A student of Leonard Feldman of the Alard Quartet, Dave has performed with many musical organizations in State College. He sat first chair in the Penn State Symphony, performed in several Music Guild concerts, played for high school and State College Community Theater musicals, performed at church services as both a soloist and an accompanist, and played with various chamber music groups.

In the high school, he was first chair in the orchestra, and cellist in the piano trio. For two years he placed first at district and regional orchestras, and was seated first in the All-State Orchestra at Harrisburg this year. At the 11-state All-Eastern Conference held in Atlantic City in the spring, he was seated second chair in the cello section.

At the spring orchestra concert and at the ensemble concert, he performed Luigi Boccherini's "Concerto for Violoncello" in B flat major and Camille Saint-Saens' "Concerto for Violoncello" in A minor. He was awarded the Col. George S. Howard Orchestra Award for musical excellence and promise at the orchestra concert.

Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was founded by Serge Koussevitsky, who was for a long time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was his dream to create a place in order to "interweave music and landscape, where a great symphony could play greatly outdoors." The other feature of his concept was the establishment of the Berkshire Music Center "for accomplished young musicians about to embark on concert careers."

DAVID BOYLE

Several important musicians have graduated from Tanglewood; one of these, Leonard Bernstein, will return to Tanglewood this summer as an adviser and conductor. Other musicians who will appear in concerts at the festival include Earl Wild, Itzhak Perlman, Zara Nelsova, William Steinberg, and Seiji Ozawa, who along with Gunther Schuller serves as an artistic director of the festival.

After participating in the Berkshire Festival Dave will attend college at the Eastman Conservatory of Music in Rochester, N.Y., beginning in early September. — JoAnn Taricani

Berkshire music center receives $35,000 grant

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUN 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Academy Receives $35,000 Grant

BOSTON — Talcott M. Banks, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Charles E. Merrill, Jr., chairman of the Charles E. Merrill Trust, have jointly announced a grant of $35,000 from the Merrill Trust, to the Berkshire Music Center, the Symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood for advanced music study.

This is the trust's second grant to the orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund, the first to the Tanglewood operation.

This grant now places the Orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund near the $2 million level. The Symphony is currently conducting this second-phase capital fund campaign to raise $6 million.

When this fund is raised and added to the $4 million subscribed to match the Ford Challenge Grant of $2 million, the Boston Symphony will have investment income sufficient to cover a large part of its annual operating deficit. Tanglewood's share of the $6 million to be raised is $2.5 million. The Tanglewood operation accounts for more than 40 per cent of the annual deficit of the orchestra.

Banks, in acknowledging the grant on behalf of the Trustees, said "For over one-third of its ninety years, the Boston Symphony has maintained the Berkshire Music Center, taking pride in the work of the numerous young men and women whose musical careers now enrich our lives. We are grateful indeed to The Charles E. Merrill Trust for their second generous grant in support of this important work."

Graduates of the Berkshire Music Center account for nearly 10 per cent of all the players in major orchestras in this country. Of these, 30 per cent are concertmasters and principals in their orchestras.

The Berkshire Music Center opens Sunday afternoon, June 28, at Tanglewood. Some 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and from abroad will study at the Center during this summer's intensive eight-week session ending August 22.

Seiji Ozawa, a Berkshire Music Center graduate, and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein, also a graduate, is advisor.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUN 15 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Gets $35,000

A grant of $35,000 has been made to the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood for advanced study, from the Charles E. Merrill Trust. This is the second contribution the trust has made to the orchestra's 90th anniversary fund, which has raised nearly $2 million of its projected goal of $6 million. The drive is being undertaken to offset the orchestra's annual operating deficit, 40 per cent of which is incurred by Tanglewood expenses. Tanglewood is expected to raise $2.5 million for the fund.

The Berkshire Music Center will open this season on June 28 with 425 students from all over the world. Graduates of the Center, who include among their number Leonard Bernstein and Gunther Schuller, comprise nearly 10 per cent of all players in major orchestras in this country. Of these, 30 per cent are concertmasters and principals in their orchestras.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUN 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Charles E. Merrill Jr., chairman of The Charles E. Merrill Trust, have jointly announced a grant of $35,000 from the Merrill Trust, to the Berkshire Music Center, the Symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood for advanced music study. This is the trust's second grant to the orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund, the first to the Tanglewood operation. Tanglewood is located in Lenox.

This grant now places the orchestra's 90th Anniversary fund near the $2 million level. The symphony is currently conducting this second-phase capital fund campaign to raise $6 million. When this fund is raised and added to the $4 million subscribed to match the Ford Challenge Grant of $2 million, the Boston Symphony will have investment income sufficient to cover a large part of its annual operating deficit. Tanglewood's share of the $6 million to be raised is $2.5 million. The Tanglewood operation accounts for more than 40 per cent of the annual deficit of the orchestra.

Mr. Banks, in acknowledging the grant on behalf of the trustees, said "For over one-third of its ninety years, the Boston Symphony has maintained the Berkshire Music Center, taking pride in the work of the numerous young men and women whose musical careers now enrich our lives. We are grateful indeed to The Charles E. Merrill Trust for their second generous grant in support of this important work."

Graduates of the Berkshire Music Center account for nearly ten per cent of all the players in major orchestras in this country. Of these, 30 per cent are concertmasters and principals in their orchestras.

The Berkshire Music Center opens Sunday afternoon, June 28, at Tanglewood. Some 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and from abroad will study at the center during this summer's intensive eight-week session ending August 22. Seiji Ozawa, a Berkshire Music Center graduate, and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein, also a graduate, is advisor.

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.

SEP 28 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO Receives $100,000 For Berkshire Center

The Boston Smphony Orchestra will establish a training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox under a $100,000 grant it has received from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Announcement of the grant was made yesterday in a joint statement by Sen. Edward W. Brooke and Rep Silvio O. Conte, both Republicans.

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,400

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD-TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 210,540

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

NEWS
MILFORD, MASS.
D. 11,172

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

MONEY MAKES MUSIC
WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

MONEY MAKES MUSIC
WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

BSO Receives Grant For Training Program

HT Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a $100,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, it was revealed yesterday.

Sen. Edward W. Brooke said the money would go toward the costs of providing a training program at the Berkshire Music Center.

THE BOSTON HERALD
Traveler
D. 210,540 S. 260,961

SEP 28 1971 New England Newsclip

$100,000 BSO Grant For Training Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a $100,000 grant from the National Endowmennt for the Arts, Sen. Edward W. Brooke and Rep. Silvio O. Conte announced yesterday.

The money is for a training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox.

ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 54,587

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

MONEY MAKES MUSIC
WASHINGTON. (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)

SEP 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Center Announces Grant

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Charles E. Merrill Jr, chairman of The Charles E. Merrill Trust, have jointly announced a grant of $35,000 from the Merrill Trust to the Berkshire Music Center, the symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood for advanced music study. This is the Trust's second grant to the orchestra's 90th Anniversary Fund, the first to the Tanglewood operation.

The Berkshire Music Center opens Sunday afternoon, June 28, at Tanglewood. Some 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and from abroad will study at the center during this summer's intensive eight-week session ending August 22. Seiji Ozawa, a Berkshire Music Center graduate, and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood; Leonard Bernstein, also a graduate, is advisor.

Hub Orchestra Gets $100,000 Federal Grant

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday was awarded $100,000 from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center.

The grant was announced jointly by Sen. Edward W. Brooke and Rep. Silvio O. Conte, both R-Mass.

BSO receives $100,000 grant

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has received a $100,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Arts for a training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 12,559

JUN 18 1971 New England Newsclip

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
D. 33,737

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

MONEY MAKES MUSIC
WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

UNION LEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
D. 21,008

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Gets $100,000 Grant

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

RECORD AMERICAN
(ALL DAY)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 415,231

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Given $100,000 Grant

Sen. Edward W. Brooke and Rep. Sylvio Conte announced Tuesday that a grant of $100,000 has been approved for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The National Endowment for the Arts has made the grant to fund a training program at the Berkshire Music Center.

NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
D. 2,800

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

MONEY MAKES MUSIC
WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

JUL 28 1971 New England Newsclip

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra was awarded $100,000 Tuesday from the National Endowment for the Arts to finance a musical training program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

122

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 40,675

JUN 26 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Redesigns West Barn

Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer in Tanglewood's newly re-designed and restructed West Barn.

The new Music Theater Project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute, Washington, D.C., is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of N. E. T. Opera, is chief coach, and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, is stage designer.

Five musical stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata Socrates, using texts from Socratic dialogues, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's Down By The Greenwood Side, commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

Aventures Et Nouvelles Aventures, by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a two-part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words. The choice of scenario is left up to the participants.

Offenbach's Croquefer, an 1857 one-act operetta comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's Mahagonny Songspiel in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The Music Theater Project's performing group includes 12 singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Conducting Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center also participate.

Designer Douglas Schmidt has redesigned the interior of Tanglewood's West Barn to provide a fluid theater environment which can be significantly altered for each work. There is no pit or balcony, but, as described by Project Director Ian Strasfogel, "only a grouping of performer and audience that shifts according to the needs and meaning of each piece."

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

JUL 10 1971

New England Newsclip

Productions Scheduled For New Tanglewood

Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer in Tanglewood's newly re-designed and restructured West Barn.

The new Music Theater Project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute, Washington D.C., is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of N.E.T. Opera, is chief coach, and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, is stage designer.

Five musical stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata SOCRATES, using texts from Socratic dialogues, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's DOWN BY THE GREENWOOD SIDE, commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

AVENTURES ET NOUVELLES AVENTURES, by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a twopart work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words. The choice of scenario is left up to the participants. AVENTURES ET NOUVELLES ~~AVENTURES~~ receives its East Coast premiere in this production.

Offenbach's CROQUEFER, an 1857 one-act operetta never before performed in this country, will be seen in a new version as a satirical comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's MAHAGONNY SONGSPIEL in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The Music Theater Project's performing group includes twelve singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Conducting Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center also participate.

Designer Douglas Schmidt has redesigned the interior of Tanglewood's West Barn to provide a fluid theater environment which can be significantly altered for each work. There is no pit or balcony, but, as described by Project Director Ian Strasfogel, "only a grouping of performer and audience that shifts according to the needs and meaning of each piece."

Mr. Strasfogel added, "Our aim in this first season is to present a broad survey of the genre — its high achievement, its great stylistic variety."

Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller noted that "With limited forces of small casts and orchestras and slight scenic demands, these pieces use the elements of opera in strkingly fresh, exciting ways which must influence the opera composer and performer of tomorrow."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,225 SUN 115,180

JUN 28 1971

Music Theater Will Return To Tanglewood's West Barn

Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer in Tanglewood's newly re-designed and restructured West Barn.

The new music theater project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute, is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of N.E.T. Opera, is chief coach, and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, is stage designer.

FIVE MUSICAL stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata Socrates, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

"Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures," by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a two-part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather thtn words. The choice of scenario is left up to the participants.

OFFENBACH'S "Croquefer," an 1857 one-act operetta never before performed in this country, will be seen in a new version as a satirical comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's Mahogonny Songspiel in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The music theater project's performing group includes 12 singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Conducting Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center also participate.

DESIGNER Douglas Schmidt has redesigned the interior of Tanglewood's West Barn to provide a fluid theater environment which can be significantly altered for each work. There is no pit or balcony, but, as described by project director Ian Strasfogel, "only a grouping of performer and audience that shifts according to the needs and meaning of each piece."

EAGLE 6/29/71

Music Theatre Projects Set At Tanglewood

Music theatre works from five periods will be presented in the redesigned and restructured West Barn on the Tanglewood grounds. The productions, made possible by a grant from the National Opera Institute, will be directed by Iran Strasfogel, chairman of the opera department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Chief coach will be Martin Smith of NET Opera, and state designer will be Douglas Schmidt of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theatre.

A company of 12 singers and two young actors will present the works. The Berkshire Music Center orchestra and conducting fellows of the Berkshire Music Center will also participate.

The works to be staged are "Socrates," Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata; "Down by the Greenwood Side" by Harrison Birtwistle; "Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures," by Gyorgi Liget; "Croquefer," an 1857 one-act operetta by Offenbach; and "Mahagonny Songspiel," written in 1927 by Kurt Weill.

EAGLE 7/20/71

First Music Theatre Project Tomorrow

The Music Theatre Project will open its first season as part of the Berkshire Music Center's summer program with the presentation of Offenbach's "Croquefer" and Bertolt Brecht's and Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel" tomorrow evening at 8:30 in the Tanglewood West Barn. The production, directed by Ignace Strasfogel and with costumes by Jeanne Button of New York, will be repeated July 22, 26 and 29.

The project will present Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," Ligeti's "Adventures," Satie's "Socrates" and a new work by the Composition Fellows at BMC on Aug. 8, 9, 11 and 12.

Gunther Schuller, artistic director at Tanglewood, will conduct both of the opening productions. Reservations are required and can be made by contacting the office of Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 6 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Theater

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer in Tanglewood's newly redesigned and restructured West Barn.

The new Music Theater project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute in Washington, D.C., is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of NET Opera, is chief coach and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, is stage director.

Five musical stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata "Socrates" using texts from Socratic dialogues, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

"Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures," by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a two-part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words. The choice of scenario is left up to the participants. "Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures" receives its East Coast premiere in this production.

Offenbach's "Croquefer," an 1857 one-act operetta never before performed in this country, will be seen in a new version as a satirical comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's "Mahogonny Songspiel" in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The Music Theater project's performing group includes twelve singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,000

JUN 25 1971

New England Newsclip

Music theatre project to be at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer in Tanglewood's newly re-designed and restructured West Barn.

The new Music Theater Project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute, Washington, D.C., is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the opera department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of N.E.T. Opera, is chief coach.

Five musical stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata "Socrates," using texts from Socratic dialogues, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

"Adventures et Nouvelles Aventures," by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a two-part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words.

Offenbach's "Croquefer," an 1857 one-act operetta never before performed in this country, will be seen in a new version as a satirical comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel" in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
JUL 23 1971
New England Newsclip

Excellent Talent, Imaginative Staging Found in New Music Theater Project

The new Music Theater Project at Tanglewood got off to a most auspicious start this week with the opening two offerings of the summer schedule.

Ian Strasfogel, head of the project, has some excellent talent with which to work, and his imaginaitive staging breathes life into ever detail.

The opening work was "Croquefer," by Jacques Offenbach. Being given its American premiere just this summer, it sparkles with wit and humor. At its opening in France, in 1857, it was a lampoon on the operatic nonsense of its day.

The version being presented at Tanglewood is an adaptation by Strasfogel, and has been updated to take a few swipes at things contemporary.

In brief, the story line concerns Croquefer and Mousse - a - mort, two rival kings whose countries have been at war with each other for over 300 years. Now the two kings are the only soldiers left.

Croquefer kidnaps Mousse - a - mort's daughter; but his nephews, who has come to help him, falls in love with her and. . .

All of the characters are dressed in outlandish costumes, and the traditional operatic gestures are played for all they are worth. To help the audience follow the plot, stagehands rush out now and then to hold up "translation" signs.

The singers — Michael Best, John Seabury, Syble Young, David Holloway, and David Hall - Sundquist — are all good, with Seabury's being the most exciting voice.

Stephen Klein is excellent as the Ringmaster, and Jay R. Perry looks the very image of Offenbach.

In lirect contrast to the fun of the Offenbach work was the theater's second production — Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht's "Mahagonny Songspiel." Written in 1927, it served as the core for a full opera composed three years later. It was the initial collaboration of these two German geniuses.

The action takes place in a boxing ring. Four gangsters, later joined by two prostitutes, go to Mahagonny, a dream city where everything is permitted.

As the six brief scenes unfold, we find that all is not as it seems here, and the characters long for another city. At the end, the dream shatters, and the disillusioned seek again.

One man readily hear the Kurt Weill of the well - known "Threepenny Opera" in the score. And one can understand why these two Germans had to get out of Germany with the rise to power of Hitler. Der Fuhrer could hardly allow social commentary like this.

The use of slides flashed on a screen above the ring added insight to the play's meaning.

Singers David Hall - Sundquist, Robert Shiesley, Lenus Carlson, John Seabury, Cheryl Kanfoush, and Joyce Castle all captured the mood of the work.

Gunther Schuller, one of the artistic directors at Tanglewood this summer, conducted the orchestra, which in each case did an excellent job. Jeanne Button came up with marvelous costumes, especially for the "Croquefer" work. Richard Lee's lighting, again particularly in the first work, was highly imaginative.

The productions are to repeated next Monday and Thursday at the West Barn in Tanglewood. They are well worth the ride up to see and hear them.

R. G.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 22 1971
New England Newsclip

Whitestone

Director Strasfogel (left) and cast of 'Croquefer' lampooning medieval hocus-pocus.

Music Review

Hilarious Night of Offenbach, Brecht

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE MUSIC THEATRE Project of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, inaugurated this year and made possible by grants from the National Opera Institute, the Martha Baird Rockefeller Foundation and the Fromm Music Foundation, presented two single-act operas last night in the West Barn. This program is to be repeated tonight and twice next week, and although there is room for but a limited audience, no one interested in vital music and sparkling performances should miss it.

The West Barn serves its special purpose to perfection, as crude as is the construction. Ian Strasfogel, head of the project, and Gunther Schuller, artistic co-director of Tanglewood and last night's orchestral conductor, presented an early Offenbach operetta, "Croquefer," and Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht's "Mahagonny Songspiel."

* * *

"CROQUEFER," or the "Last of the Paladins," is as incongruous a piece as the theatre of the mid-19th century would permit and the Parisian public evidently could swallow and even that was tampered with, according to the program notes, to "lampoon the medieval hocus-pocus rampant on opera stages at that time." The version of last night included the insertion of implausible excerpts from other Offenbach works and even the final trio from Meyerbeer's "Robert il Diavolo," "Croquefer's" predecessor by a quarter of a century.

When anything patently ludicrous was enacted on stage, a corps of poster-bearers darted out and back from the wings with signs explaining and thereby doubling the confusion in the most hilarious and witty manner. The vocalists, in fantastic costumes, for all the grotesque abandoned gaiety, were just plain wonderful. Michael Best, the last of the Heroic Champions and Paragons of Chivalry, John Seabury, as Mousse-a-mort, his life-long enemy, Syble Young, fascinating as Fleur de Souffre, Mousse's daughter, and David Hall-Sundquist, as Ramasse-ta-tete, Crouque's long-lost nephew, were outstanding in their many and zany opportunities. The protagonists are both advanced students and professional singers of exceptional ability.

* * *

THE OFFENBACH orchestra, which was placed to the side of the ample stage, was replaced in the Brecht-Weill piece by a smaller ensemble, this time placed to the opposite side, and doubly melding with the stage action by wearing costumes, at least hats of an obviously absurd type, conductor Schuller as well entering into the spirit of the moment.

This short work was of the German period of collaboration of the two men and before their United States careers. It is grim and unpleasant in both characters and action, but it was done with properly offensive realism. A stage crew constructed an elevated prize-ring before the audience's eyes. The gangsters and prostitutes conveyed the malodorius nature of the play with thorough verisimilitude.

* * *

CHERYL KANFOUSH as Jessie and Joyce Castle as Bessie were vocally superb and in costume and makeup were too true to be good. Hall-Sundquist and Seabury as Charlie and Jimmy, respectively, doubled in parts of both operas and were joined in the second by Robert Shiesley as Billy and Lenus Carlson as Bobby.

Weill's music is identifiable at once to anyone familiar with his Threepenny Opera and Brecht's theatre is sui generis. The total atmosphere is as smoke-clouded, heavy and degraded as the Offenbach was light, gay and airy. It was totally enjoyable. A second program to be presented four times mext mid-month will include four recent and contemporary works, one written collaboratively by composition fellows at Tanglewood this summer.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 531,160
JUL 4 1971
New England Newsclip

Opera returns to Tanglewood

Music theatre returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer due, in part, to a grant from the National Opera Institute, Washington, D.C. Five musical stage works from different periods will be presented as part of the Music Theatre Project directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory of Music.

The works include Erik Satie's "Socrate," Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," Gyorgi Ligeti's "Aventures" and "Nouvelles Aventures," Offenbach's "Croquefer," and Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny" (in its 1927 Singspiel version).

Performances will be given in the re-designed West Barn.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
JUL 24 1971
New England Newsclip

Weill's 'Mahagonny' nicely staged

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Kurt Weill's first composition on texts by Bertold Brecht was the "Mahagonny Songspiel" of 1927. Weill set five poems from Brecht's "Haus Postille" plus a newly-written finale, and the 25-minute stage work that was the result was later expanded into the now rather better known full length opera, "The Rise and Fall of the City of Mahagonny."

On Wednesday and Thursday evenings of this week, the music theater project at Tanglewood provided a rare opportunity to see and hear the original "Little Mahagonny."

The most famous of the "Mahagonny" hits, the "Alabama Song" is part of the original version, which also includes the "Benares Song," the powerful "Gott in Mahagonny," and a moment of real theatrical genius when three men terrifyingly threaten a fourth to the music their own uncannily mellifluous humming (their menacing posture and the scene dissolves suddenly in mirthless and even more frightening "ha, ha, ha"). Some splendid things were added in the later full-length "Mahagonny" — "Demn Wie Man Sich Bettet So Liegt Man," the touching duet about the cranes, the scene in which one of the men gorges himself to death — but even more of what was added is padding.

Remembering a certain restlessness and dissatisfaction that attends any performance of the full opera, it seems clear that it is the original "Mahagonny Songspiel" that makes the most powerful statement of this story of immigration into a horrendous Brechtian, mythical America by quasi-gangster types who carry their passion for the Golden Calf and their capacity for boredom and exploitation with them wherever they go. And it is, I believe, a question not only of the absence of Weill's operatic padding, but also the presence of a perfect congruence of the time scale of the work as a whole with that of its parts (Weill, for all his brilliance, was short-winded), and the congruence of that time scale with its characteristic sonority, an astounding intersection of cabaret and Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony.

The Tanglewood production, staged by Ian Strasfogel, conducted by Gunther Schuller, designed by Douglas W. Schmidt (in a boxing ring, like the 1927 premier in Baden-Baden), and dressed by Jeanne Button, is an excellent one, tough and muscular, terse and economical, eye-searingly ugly, and, like book and score, hovering expertly on the edge of parody. Musically it goes extremely well, too, with good singers — David Hall-Sundquist, Robert Shiesley, Lenus Carlson, John Seabury, Cheryl Kamfoush, Joyce Castle — my one reservation being that in the racketing acoustics of Tanglewood's West Barn, I could not always find the singers' words.

"Mahagonny" is the second and more interesting half of the double bill that begins with an adaptation of Offenbach's "Croquesser." The piece is thin theater with a few amusing gags, and it has a bubbly score, reinforced here by borrowing from three other Offenbach works, with some parody of puffed-up contemporary grand opera, including Meyerbeer's once so famous "Rapaplam" chorus. The production is by the same team that did "Magagonny," with good male singers and a stiff soubrette, and it works best whenever it lets you see and hear Offenbach straight, but tends often to get swamped in a narcissistic flood of directorial cleverness.

The double bill is repeated at Tanglewood July 26 and 29.

124

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

JUN 28 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Theater Project scheduled at Tanglewood

Music theater returns on a regular basis to the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, this summer in Tanglewood's newly re-designed and restructured West Barn.

The new Music Theater Project, supported in part by a grant from the National Opera Institute, Washington D.C., is directed by Ian Strasfogel, chairman of the Opera Department of the New England Conservatory of Music. Martin Smith, music supervisor of N.E.T. Opera, is chief coach, and Douglas Schmidt, staff designer for Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, is stage designer.

Five musical stage works from different periods will be produced. Erik Satie's 1918 scenic cantata "Socrates", using texts from Scoratic dialogues, will be given one of its rare performances in this country, sung in English. Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side", commissioned in 1969 by the Music Theatre Ensemble of London, is a grotesque parody of traditional English pantomime.

"Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures," by Hungarian-born Gyorgi Ligeti, is a two-part work scored for three performers who sing sounds of the phonetic alphabet rather than words. The choice of scenario is left up to the participants. "Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures" receives its East Coast premiere in this production.

Offenbach's "Croquefer," an 1857 one-act operetta never before performed in this country, will be seen in a new version as a satirical comment on certain contemporary mores. The fifth production is the American premiere of Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel" in its original German version written in 1927 by Weill and Berthold Brecht for the Baden-Baden Festival.

The Music Theater Project's performing group includes twelve singers and two actors who are young professionals or graduate students. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Conducting Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center also participate.

Designer Douglas Schmidt has redesigned the interior of Tanglewood's West Barn to provide a fluid theater environment which can be significantly altered for each work. There is no pit or balcony, but, as described by Project Director Ian Strasfogel, "only a grouping of performer and audience that shifts according to the needs and meaning of each piece."

Mr. Strasfogel added, "Our aim in this first season is to present a broad survey of the genre — its high achievement, its great stylistic variety."

Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller noted that "With limited forces of small casts and orchestras and slight scenic demands, these pieces use the elements of opera in strikingly fresh, exciting ways which must influence he opera composer and performer of tomorrow."

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

AUG 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Theater Project Lists Second Series

The second series of Tanglewood's 1971 Music Theater Project performance opens Sunday, Aug. 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn with the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By the Greenwood Side."

On the same program the east coast premiere of Ligeti's "Adventures" and Satie's "Socrates" will be presented.

Three other performances will be given: Monday, Aug. 9, Wednesday, Aug. 11, and Thursday, Aug. 12. All performances begin at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn; located near the Lion Gate.

The central action of Birtwistle's "Down By the Greenwood Side" is derived from the spoken drama of the Mummer's Play, which evolved in the British provinces during Elizabethan times. The play, with its part comic, part grotesque rhymed couplets, presents a ritual succession of battles, deaths, healings and rebirths.

Ligeti's "Adventures" consists of two works composed by Ligeti to phonetic texts: "Adventures," written in 1962, and "Nouvelles Adventures," composed between 1962 and 1965. Ian Strasfogel, director of the Music Theater Project, says, "Our realization of the piece takes as its central image that of people trapped in a room, desperately trying to escape as the hostile environment slowly closes in on them." These two pieces have been performed in concert, but rarely on stage because of their tremendous musical complexity.

Erik Satie's "Socrates," a "symphonic drama for voices," was composed in 1918 on commission from the Comtesse Edmond de Polignac. The work depicts Socrates from three vantage points using the texts of the Platonic dialogue.

The Music Theater Project, an integral part of the Berkshire Music Center's 1971 summer program, has been made possible in part by grants from the National Opera Institute and the Fromm Music Foundation.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Project Opens Sunday

The second music theatre project at Tanglewood will be presented this Sunday evening at 8:30 in the West Barn. The program will feature the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," Ligeti's "Adventures" and Satie's "Socrates."

"Greenwood" is based on the mummer's play, dating from Elizabethan times in the British provinces. "Adventures" is a contemporary piece, and "Socrates" depicts the great philosopher through the use of Platonic dialogue. The project is under the direction of Ian Strasfogel.

Performances will also be given Monday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week. Curtain time is 8:30 p.m.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 10 1971 New England Newsclip

'Adventures' brilliantly staged

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — If avant-garde musical theater has a comic masterpiece, it is surely Gyorgy Ligeti's "Aventures" (1962) and its companion-piece, "Nouvelles Aventures" (1965). The two were performed together by the Music Theater Project at Tanglewood Sunday evening (repeated Aug. 11 and 12) as partof a triple bill also, including the American premiere of "Down by the Greenwood Side" by Harrison Birtwistle and Satie's 'Socrate."

Ligeti's adventures, old and new, are short pieces, not quite 15 minutes each, for three singers (the production here distributes the soprano part of the second between two singers) and seven instrumentalists The phonetic, non-semantic text is the composer's own, and it includes almost every imaginable sound that can be produced by the human voice. The vocal parts stand in the foreground. But they are most imaginatively into the instrumental texture, often by means of delicate aural puns. The surface is fun and games, but Ligeti is always a composer, never a mere effects man, and the two sets of "Aventures" propound musical relationships that are rewarding and delightful to listen to, as many who own the excellent Heliodor recording will have discovered.

There is no scenario, but the texts in their musical setting are constantly suggestive of some affect or confrontation, and what Ian Strasfogel has done in his brilliant and very funny staging is to make visible what he has heard. In a receding box designed by Douglas Schmidt, four young singers, Syble Young, Joyce Castle, David Holloway, and Poppy Holden, do a super-virtuoso job of singing and a very good one of flinging themselves about, the whole thing being superbly paced by Gunther Schuller and excellently played by Berkshire Music Center students (playing includes tearing paper, rubbing piano strings with a hairbrush, and breaking a Coke bottle).

Satie's "Socrate," a series of settings for voice and small orchestra of passages from Plato's Symposium, Phaedrus, and Phaedo, seems to me so chaste a masterpiece — Satie was not one of the 20th century's great composers, but "Socrate" is one of its great works — as to resist the kind of reification that a staging (or even the division of its vocal line among several singers to indicate the different personages) brings with it. Strasfogel's staging was in fact as discreet as possible, except possible in so far as he both veiled and heightened the homosexual bias of the text by assigning the parts of Alcibiades and Phaedrus to a strikingly attractive young woman at whom Socrates in white pyjamas smiled sweetly and without cease.

This, too, was beautifully conducted by Schuller, with particularly effective singing (plus rather too much mugging) by Barbara Hocher as Phaedo, and almost very good singing, spoiled by too punchy and Broadwayish a delivery by Doris Peterson in those two aycee-deecee roles. With Debussy's "Pelleas," "Socrate" must be one of the most untranslatable things in the world, and the English version by Yale Marshall and Wesley Balk did an amazing job of dealing with the impossible.

Birtwistle's "dramatic pastoral," in which St. George is twice killed and resurrected, and through which there wanders a coloratura infanticide, seemed on the basis of one hearing to be (in contrast to "Aventures") fun and games with not much music. Except for the bad mother, the parts are for speakers rather than singers, and the instruments punctuate and underline rather neutrally. Bruno Maderna conducted, and there were outstanding performances by Barbara Hocher as the shrill lady and by Stephen Klein as Father Christmas, who functions as master of ceremonies and Evangelist for this tale.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 20 1971 New England Newsclip

First Music Theater Set at Tanglewood

The first production of the new Music Theater Project at Tanglewood, Lenox, this summer is Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. when Offenbach's "Croquefer" and Berthold Brecht's and Kurt Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel" are performed in the newly renovated West Barn.

The Music Theater Project, an integral part of the Berkshire Music Center's 1971 summer program, has been made possible in part by grants from the National Opera Institute and the Fromm Music Foundation.

In addition, a generous grant from the Martha Baird Rockefeller Fund for Music, Inc., has made possible the final refurbishing of the West Barn and its conversion into an intimate theater quickly adaptable to the demands of the diverse music theater pieces to be produced.

In August, the Project will also produce Birtwistle's "Down by the Greenwood Side," "Adventures," Satie's "Socrates" and a new work to be evolved collaboratively by the Composition Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center working with Project Director Ian Strasfogel and Tanglewood Composer - in - residence' Bruno Maderna. These will be seen on Aug. 8 ,9, 11 and 12.

The Offenbach piece will be seen in a new version which is largely the work of Director Strasfogel. Additional material from other Offenbach operettas is utilized as well as an interpolated fragment of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable." The additional material is orchestrated by Henry Mollicone and by Tanglewood's Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, who will conduct both productions.

The noted New York costume designer Jeanne Button will design the costumes for all Music Theater Project productions.

Seating for the Offenbach piece will be traditional in form, but for the Brecht - Weill "Mahagonny," the theater will be rearranged in the shape of a boxing ring, in which the action takes place, with audience on four sides. Photo montage projections will be adapted from the work of the German artist John Hartfield, a contemporary of Brecht and Weill.

The July 21 Offenbach - Brecht - Weill evening will be repeated on July 22, 26 and 29. Performances are open to members of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Because of extremely limited seating — less than 200 places for each performance — seats are reserved. Reservations are taken through the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 8 1971 New England Newsclip

BRUNO MADERNA

DEFYING THE ARTS

Maderna Proves Committee Can Create Musical Work of Art

By R. C. HAMMERICH
Republican Staff

LENOX — There is a small group of creators at Tanglewood who are defying one of the most deeply established beliefs in the arts. . .that a work of art cannot be created by committee.

Advising the group of 10 or 15 young composers and performers is Bruno Maderna, a musician of high international stature.

For two weeks the members of the group have been creating a music drama, collectively and separately, by composing passages of melody and words on the basis of suggestions made during group sessions and changing them during subsequent group sessions.

It will have its first public performance at Tanglewood tonight and continues tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday along with three other, existing, short music dramas.

They are doing it for educational purposes, namely, mainly, to stretch their compositional muscles as part of the reestablished opera department in the Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The rejuvenated department is called the Music Theater Project and is supported by grants from several foundations. Involved are a dozen singers and two actors plus any of the center's composing or conducting fellows or members of the center orchestra as needed.

Its director is Ian Strasfogel of the New England Conservatory of Music. Maderna, who is not exactly typical of the world's leading contemporary musicians, is its musical advisor.

But he exhibits several of the typical attributes, i.e., popular conductor, avant garde composer, busy lecturer and teacher, amiable associate.

Early in his visit at Tanglewood this summer he won the enthusiastic support of the members of Boston's orchestra while rehearsing them for his appearance July 11 as guest conductor. They liked him for his thorough knowledge of the music he was conducting, for the strongly decisive attitude he had about it, for his clearly - understood means of communicating his ideas and for his friendly, but no-nonsense and unpretentious manner.

On the podium during rehearsals it was obvious that he knew exactly how he wanted each phrase and passage to sound, which is not always the case with conductors.

His decisions about interpretation of the score were strongly held, and, in spite of some difficulty with the English language, he showed no lack of understanding of the orchestral language. The players had no difficulty in understanding what he wished them to do, a factor which increased their respect.

Such appreciation of guest conductors by orchestra members is uncommon; and it included those members who don't care for the kind of music Maderna composes.

At 51 he is not a radical youth, but he is one of the founders of the Fonologia Musicale in Milan, one of the early important studios for electronic music, and an advocate of atonalism.

His compositions show a strong influence from the work of the Viennese school (Schoenberg, Berg) which broke away from the traditional, tonal structure of music, and his name is sometimes coupled with the contemporary, atonal Italian composers, Luciano Berio and Luigi Nono. To the casual listener, their music may sound discordant and chaotic.

Maderna is a smiling, voluble, ebullient, energetic, jovial Italian with the sort of gregarious personality that can make him an effective teacher, especially in the atmosphere surrounding the group - creation of the little music - drama that will have its birth tonight.

It will be 20 to 30 minutes long, will have 10 to 15 in the cast and will be evolved from Trimalchio's banquet sequence from the "Satyricon" by Petronius Arbiter.

The "Satyricon" is a satire on the vulgar and dissolute life of the citizens of Rome, written at the time of the reign of Nero and the decline of the Empire. Trimalchio was a very wealthy citizen.

Ordinarily a composer or librettist, in splendid isolation, puts down on paper, one by one, the notes and words he thinks will enable his reader to reproduce his musical or literary ideas. The performer then, as best he can, recreates what he thinks the composer's "true meaning" is.

In this case at Tanglewood the method of composition is cumbersome. Bits from Petronius' writing (sights, dialogue, movement) are discussed with a view toward reproduction in music and action.

Short sequences, having been chosen by the group, are taken to semi-isolation by sub-groups of three or four singers, actors and composers where the sequence is reproduced in music and action.

This reproduction is displayed before the whole group for acceptance, rejection or modification. Thus, gradually, the whole music drama is "composed" by the whole group.

"They learn; they discover," said Maderna. "All the problems are seen with many eyes."

See DEFYING
Page LT 2

126

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Theater Interesting

LENOX — The new Music Theater Project at Tanglewood is staging three one-act music dramas this week, two of them new and bizarre, the other old and academic.

The first of four performances was Sunday; the final two are tonight and tomorrow at 8.30 in the West Barn off Hawthorne Street. Reservations are necessary. Seating is limited to about 200. (637-1600)

The project, sponsored by a few foundations, is part of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is under the direction of Ian Strasfogel of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Its productions are designed and performed by advanced students of music, theater and dance who are members of the center.

The most impressive production of the current series on opening night was Gyorgy Ligeti's "Adventures," an almost impossibly difficult abstract expression of human conflicts and frustrations written between 1962 and 1965.

Four people are trapped in a symbolic room or cage; they express themselves in non-verbal symbolic sounds (vocal equipment is used to produce every human sound imaginable except words) and their movement expresses their changing relationships and attitudes.

The sequence illustrates most human conditions and emotions (love, hate, anger, curiosity, laughter, jealousy) as the characters, frustrated by their confinement, gradually become more and more irrational, eventually insane and finally animalistic.

Watching it (about 40 minutes) is a disturbing experience, and the participants, smiling under final audience approval, were obviously exhausted.

But not everyone in the audience liked it. Overheard objections referred to the ugliness of the ideas expressed.

The other works on the program were the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By the Greenwood Side," and Erik Satie's "Socrates."

The Birtwistle piece (about 40 minutes) presented a strange collection of stylized characters whose otherwordly, comic-strip appearances and utterances made only occasional sense, presumbably on purpose.

Action included mock-medieval jousts on hobby horses, symbolic switches of weapons between antagonists and miraculous resurrections by a physician who uses a tire pump to revive his dead patients.

The opera-play-pageant is simultaneously grotesque and farcical, and it is filled with symbols that pass by rapidly, usually unrecognized.

Satie's "Socrates" was composed in 1918 on commission and is rather static. It presents four characters in Grecian setting who converse in Platonic dialogue set to music harmonically organized according to modal scales.

Not much happens, even when Socrates drinks the poison and dies. He does it with supreme philosophical control.

The piece makes an odd cumulative impression, however, and is memorable without us knowing why.

(R. C. Hammerich).

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

New Series at Tanglewood

B. Syn

LENOX — The second series of Tanglewood's 1971 Music Theater Project performances opened Sunday at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn with the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By The Greenwood Side."

On the same program the East Coast premiere of Ligeti's "Adventures" and Satie's "Socrates" was presented. Three other performances will be given tonight, Wednesday and Thursday. All performances begin at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, located near the Lion Gate.

The central action of Birtwistle's "Down By The Greenwood Side" is derived from the spoken drama of the Mummer's Play, which evolved in the British provinces during Elizabethan times. The play, with its part comic, part grotesque rhymed couplets, presents a ritual succession of battles, deaths, healings and rebirths.

Ligeti's "Adventures" consists of two works composed by Ligeti to phonetic texts: "Adventures," written in 1962, and "Nouvelles Adventures," composed between 1962 and 1965.

Ian Strasfogel, director of the Music Theater Project, says, "Our realization of the piece takes as its central image that of people trapped in a room, desperately trying to escape as the hostile environment slowly closed in on them."

These two pieces have been performed in concert, but rarely on stage because of their tremendous musical complexity.

Erik Satie's "Socrates" a "symphonic drama for voices," was composed in 1918 on commission from the Comtesse Edmond de Polignac. The work depicts Socrates from three vantage points using the texts of the Platonic dialogue.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Operas at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Father Christmas, Bold Slasher, Socrates, two Bens and two Marys, and four singers who didn't sing were among the characters in a glut of music theater in the Berkshires last week. To call these pieces operas would be inaccurate although the participants were in costume, sang or mouthed roles to musical accompaniment, and otherwise indulged in musicotheatrical activity of varied sorts.

As part of the Berkshire Music Center's Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood, the music project under Ian Strasfogel's direction presented a challenging triple bill of novelties: Harrison Birtwistle's "Down on the Greenwood Side," Erik Satie's "Socrate," and Gyorgy Ligeti's "Aventures et nouvelles aventures." Next door, geographically as well as stylistically, the Lenox Art Center gave the first performances (there will be more Aug. 19-22) of "Dream Tantras for Western Massachusetts" by Stanley Silverman and Richard Foreman, whose previous collaboration — "Elephant Steps" — has been a source of amuse- and puzzlement. A visit to either or both places last week would certainly give a fair idea of the theatrical inroads that are being made not only into dramatic music but into its production as well.

The Birtwistle piece, in its first American performances, like his previous "Punch and Judy" gives British traditionalism a violent shaking up in "Greenwood." Mrs. Green, subject of a sentimental ballad in which a "cruel mother" killed "her only son," is somehow drawn into a mummer's play with its stock characters—Father Christmas, St. George, Bold Slasher, and Dr. Blood. Their cumbersome symbolic battles are also joined by Jack (morris dance) Finney as the green man who rounds out a story more inferred than explained. Of the performers, only Mrs. Green sings — dementedly — while the men speak and roar, and the orchestra comments, also dementedly. It's a strange piece, fascinating in its bizarre simplistic structure and chilling in both its visual and tonal implications. It isn't apt to turn up at the Met as a substitute for "Cavalleria Rusticana," however. The performances and the production were exemplary.

'Socrate'

Satie's "Socrate," here sung in English translation, is a contrasting work of equal power, although its impact was achieved by an almost unvaryingly reposeful treatment. Three brief episodes based on the Platonic dialogues served as frames for some of the loveliest music Satie ever wrote, and in staging what is essentially a series of undramatic scenes Mr. Strasfogel succeeded admirably in infusing each successively with dignity, wryness, and pathos by the simplest theatrical means. Michael Best, Doris Peterson, Barbara Hocher, and Robert Shiesley were the sensitive interpreters.

The Ligeti birthplace is said to have been in what was Transylvania, home of Count Dracula and other weird manifestations. His "Adventures" and "Nouvelles adventures," two separate pieces written to gristly phonetic texts for concert performances, were joined together and staged on this occasion, the striking setting by Douglas W. Schmidt (like those for the first two pieces) being in this case a sinister exitless room. The subject matter chosen by Mr. Strasfogel concerned four individuals apparently eternally trapped by undetermined circumstances and frantic in their alternately hopeful and failing attempts to communicate. What they are up to is in almost every instance subject to a variety of interpretations as they thrash, dash, and throw themselves and one another about the stage.

Ligeti's musical vocabulary for the mezzo-soprano, baritone, and two sopranos is a wildly explosive string of noises almost animalistic, almost human, nearly mechanical, and somehow continuously absorbing—not only on account of their startling inventiveness, but because of the apparent sense they seem about to make. Pitch, intensity, tone, and vibration are all scrambled together into an infernal, unworldly sound spectrum produced by the four nonsinging singers accompanied by instrumentalists who have it easy by comparison. One can only be overcome with admiration for Joyce Castle, David Holloway, Syble Young, and Poppy Holden, who not only gave vent to these diabolical sounds (hopefully at no expense to their own vocal equipment), but coordinated them with Mr. Strasfogel's unceasing danse macabre in truly virtuosic style.

Highest level

Last week's performances — conducted respectively by John L. De Main, Paul Polivnick, and Thomas Michalak, in lieu of Bruno Maderna (the Birtwistle) and Gunther Schuller, who had directed the opening and second nights — were on the highest interpretative level, visually and aurally. Instrumental playing by Music Center fellows of this difficult music was again admirable, and among the performers onstage there were none, singing or growling, who weren't top flight. On this basis, Mr. Strasfogel has made the music theater a project to be cherished.

Meanwhile, at the Lenox Art Center, "Dream Tantras" (the word is Hindu in origin) has been greeted enthusiastically, largely by the with-it set for which it was written. It has a provocative rock score (Silverman), and a flimsy plot structure to hang it on (Foreman), but like much of what passes for theater these days the strong disparity between the ingredients doesn't seem to bother the young audience. The problems besetting Ben I and Ben II, and Mary I and Mary II, are of course easily recognized by it and the fact that "Tantras" is staged in a broad campy style with most of the current clichés worked in somewhere makes the whole thing relevant if you want it to be.

The Art Center's production is rather kamp-kill-kare in style, but the Silverman score gets a rousing exposition by a band which is nameless. Of the decidedly variable cast, Seth Allen (Ben II) is by far the most personable and professional.

NEWS ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
W. 5,050

AUG 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Theater Opens 4th Play

STOCKBRIDGE — Berkshire Theater Festival 1971 opens its fourth season production tonight with Terrence McNally's "Where Has Tommy Flowers Gone?"

The play, which previewed Tuesday night, is directed by Jacques Levy. The play closes Aug. 21. Performances start at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and at 5 and 9 p.m. Saturday.

126

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Theater Interesting

LENOX — The new Music Theater Project at Tanglewood is staging three one-act music dramas this week, two of them new and bizarre, the other old and academic.

The first of four performances was Sunday; the final two are tonight and tomorrow at 8.30 in the West Barn off Hawthorne Street. Reservations are necessary. Seating is limited to about 200. (637-1600)

The project, sponsored by a few foundations, is part of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer academy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is under the direction of Ian Strasfogel of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Its productions are designed and performed by advanced students of music, theater and dance who are members of the center.

The most impressive production of the current series on opening night was Gyorgy Ligeti's "Adventures," an almost impossibly difficult abstract expression of human conflicts and frustrations written between 1962 and 1965.

Four people are trapped in a symbolic room or cage; they express themselves in non-verbal symbolic sounds (vocal equipment is used to produce every human sound imaginable except words) and their movement expresses their changing relationships and attitudes.

The sequence illustrates most human conditions and emotions (love, hate, anger, curiosity, laughter, jealousy) as the characters, frustrated by their confinement, gradually become more and more irrational, eventually insane and finally animalistic.

Watching it (about 40 minutes) is a disturbing experience, and the participants, smiling under final audience approval, were obviously exhausted.

But not everyone in the audience liked it. Overheard objections referred to the ugliness of the ideas expressed.

The other works on the program were the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By the Greenwood Side," and Erik Satie's "Socrates."

The Birtwistle piece (about 40 minutes) presented a strange collection of stylized characters whose otherwordly, comic-strip appearances and utterances made only occasional sense, presumbably on purpose.

Action included mock-medieval jousts on hobby horses, symbolic switches of weapons between antagonists and miraculous resurrections by a physician who uses a tire pump to revive his dead patients.

The opera-play-pageant is simultaneously grotesque and farcical, and it is filled with symbols that pass by rapidly, usually unrecognized.

Satie's "Socrates" was composed in 1918 on commission and is rather static. It presents four characters in Grecian setting who converse in Platonic dialogue set to music harmonically organized according to modal scales.

Not much happens, even when Socrates drinks the poison and dies. He does it with supreme philosophical control.

The piece makes an odd cumulative impression, however, and is memorable without us knowing why.

(R. C. Hammerich).

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 9 1971 New England Newsclip

New Series at Tanglewood

LENOX — The second series of Tanglewood's 1971 Music Theater Project performances opened Sunday at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn with the American premiere of Harrison Birtwistle's "Down By The Greenwood Side."

On the same program the East Coast premiere of Ligeti's "Adventures" and Satie's "Socrates" was presented. Three other performances will be given tonight, Wednesday and Thursday. All performances begin at 8.30 p.m. in the West Barn, located near the Lion Gate.

The central action of Birtwistle's "Down By The Greenwood Side" is derived from the spoken drama of the Mummer's Play, which evolved in the British provinces during Elizabethan times. The play, with its part comic, part grotesque rhymed couplets, presents a ritual succession of battles, deaths, healings and rebirths.

Ligeti's "Adventures" consists of two works composed by Ligeti to phonetic texts: "Adventures," written in 1962, and "Nouvelles Adventures," composed between 1962 and 1965.

Ian Strasfogel, director of the Music Theater Project, says, "Our realization of the piece takes as its central image that of people trapped in a room, desperately trying to escape as the hostile environment slowly closed in on them."

These two pieces have been performed in concert, but rarely on stage because of their tremendous musical complexity.

Erik Satie's "Socrates" a "symphonic drama for voices," was composed in 1918 on commission from the Comtesse Edmond de Polignac. The work depicts Socrates from three vantage points using the texts of the Platonic dialogue.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264

AUG 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Operas at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Father Christmas, Bold Slasher, Socrates, two Bens and two Marys, and four singers who didn't sing were among the characters in a glut of music theater in the Berkshires last week. To call these pieces operas would be inaccurate although the participants were in costume, sang or mouthed roles to musical accompaniment, and otherwise indulged in musicotheatrical activity of varied sorts.

As part of the Berkshire Music Center's Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood, the music project under Ian Strasfogel's direction presented a challenging triple bill of novelties: Harrison Birtwistle's "Down on the Greenwood Side," Erik Satie's "Socrate," and Gyorgy Ligeti's "Aventures et nouvelles aventures." Next door, geographically as well as stylistically, the Lenox Art Center gave the first performances (there will be more Aug. 19-22) of "Dream Tantras for Western Massachusetts" by Stanley Silverman and Richard Foreman, whose previous collaboration — "Elephant Steps" — has been a source of amuse- and puzzlement. A visit to either or both places last week would certainly give a fair idea of the theatrical inroads that are being made not only into dramatic music but into its production as well.

The Birtwistle piece, in its first American performances, like his previous "Punch and Judy" gives British traditionalism a violent shaking up in "Greenwood." Mrs. Green, subject of a sentimental ballad in which a "cruel mother" killed "her only son," is somehow drawn into a mummer's play with its stock characters—Father Christmas, St. George, Bold Slasher, and Dr. Blood. Their cumbersome symbolic battles are also joined by Jack (morris dance) Finney as the green man who rounds out a story more inferred than explained. Of the performers, only Mrs. Green sings — dementedly — while the men speak and roar, and the orchestra comments, also dementedly. It's a strange piece, fascinating in its bizarre simplistic structure and chilling in both its visual and tonal implications. It isn't apt to turn up at the Met as a substitute for "Cavalleria Rusticana," however. The performances and the production were exemplary.

'Socrate'

Satie's "Socrate," here sung in English translation, is a contrasting work of equal power, although its impact was achieved by an almost unvaryingly reposeful treatment. Three brief episodes based on the Platonic dialogues served as frames for some of the loveliest music Satie ever wrote, and in staging what is essentially a series of undramatic scenes Mr. Strasfogel succeeded admirably in infusing each successively with dignity, wryness, and pathos by the simplest theatrical means. Michael Best, Doris Peterson, Barbara Hocher, and Robert Shiesley were the sensitive interpreters.

The Ligeti birthplace is said to have been in what was Transylvania, home of Count Dracula and other weird manifestations. His "Adventures" and "Nouvelles adventures," two separate pieces written to gristly phonetic texts for concert performances, were joined together and staged on this occasion, the striking setting by Douglas W. Schmidt (like those for the first two pieces) being in this case a sinister exitless room. The subject matter chosen by Mr. Strasfogel concerned four individuals apparently eternally trapped by undetermined circumstances and frantic in their alternately hopeful and failing attempts to communicate. What they are up to is in almost every instance subject to a variety of interpretations as they thrash, dash, and throw themselves and one another about the stage.

Ligeti's musical vocabulary for the mezzo-soprano, baritone, and two sopranos is a wildly explosive string of noises almost animalistic, almost human, nearly mechanical, and somehow continuously absorbing—not only on account of their startling inventiveness, but because of the apparent sense they seem about to make. Pitch, intensity, tone, and vibration are all scrambled together into an infernal, unworldly sound spectrum produced by the four nonsinging singers accompanied by instrumentalists who have it easy by comparison. One can only be overcome with admiration for Joyce Castle, David Holloway, Syble Young, and Poppy Holden, who not only gave vent to these diabolical sounds (hopefully at no expense to their own vocal equipment), but coordinated them with Mr. Strasfogel's unceasing danse macabre in truly virtuosic style.

Highest level

Last week's performances — conducted respectively by John L. De Main, Paul Polivnick, and Thomas Michalak, in lieu of Bruno Maderna (the Birtwistle) and Gunther Schuller, who had directed the opening and second nights — were on the highest interpretative level, visually and aurally. Instrumental playing by Music Center fellows of this difficult music was again admirable, and among the performers onstage there were none, singing or growling, who weren't top flight. On this basis, Mr. Strasfogel has made the music theater a project to be cherished.

Meanwhile, at the Lenox Art Center, "Dream Tantras" (the word is Hindu in origin) has been greeted enthusiastically, largely by the with-it set for which it was written. It has a provocative rock score (Silverman), and a flimsy plot structure to hang it on (Foreman), but like much of what passes for theater these days the strong disparity between the ingredients doesn't seem to bother the young audience. The problems besetting Ben I and Ben II, and Mary I and Mary II, are of course easily recognized by it and the fact that "Tantras" is staged in a broad campy style with most of the current clichés worked in somewhere makes the whole thing relevant if you want it to be.

The Art Center's production is rather kamp-kill-kare in style, but the Silverman score gets a rousing exposition by a band which is nameless. Of the decidedly variable cast, Seth Allen (Ben II) is by far the most personable and professional.

NEWS ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
W. 5,050

AUG 11 1971 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Theater Opens 4th Play

STOCKBRIDGE — Berkshire Theater Festival 1971 opens its fourth season production tonight with Terrence McNally's "Where Has Tommy Flowers Gone?"

The play, which previewed Tuesday night, is directed by Jacques Levy. The play closes Aug. 21. Performances start at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and at 5 and 9 p.m. Saturday.

TIMES (SUNDAY)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
1,407,549

AUG 22 1971

New England Newsclip

Clemens Kalischer

Poppy Holden sings sounds, but no words, in György Ligeti's avant-garde opera, "Nouvelles Aventures," staged recently at Tanglewood.
"The music was excellently played, and included tearing paper, rubbing piano strings with a hairbrush and breaking a Coke bottle"

cont'd from preceding page

An Opera Theater for Our Time?

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX, Mass.

FOR the first time in some years, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has an opera department again. Called the Music Theater Project, it is modestly budgeted, housed in the West Barn, a problematic but apparently stimulating structure, and its work is carried on under the direction of Ian Strasfogel by 20 holders of National Opera Institute fellowships, nine of them singers, the others on the technical and dramatic staff.

Earlier this summer, the Music Theater Project offered a double bill in which a really apt production of Brecht and Weill's "Mahagonny Songspiel" was paired with an excessively cute one of Offenbach's "Croquefer." Now, as part of the Fromm Foundation's annual Festival of Contemporary Music here, there were four performances of an interesting triple bill consisting of "Down by the Greenwood Side" by Harrison Birtwistle, Erik Satie's "Socrate," and György Ligeti's "Aventures" and "Nouvelles Aventures."

If avant-garde musical theater has a comic masterpiece, it is surely "Aventures" (1962) and its companion piece, "Nouvelles Aventures" (1965), Ligeti's adventures, old and new, are short pieces, not quite 15 minutes each, for three singers (the production here distributed the soprano part of the second between two singers) and seven instrumentalists. The phonetic, non-semantic text is the composer's own, and it includes almost every imaginable sound that can be produced by the human voice.

The vocal parts stand in the foreground, but they are firmly and imaginatively integrated into the instrumental textures, often by means of delicate aural puns. The surface is fun and games, but Ligeti is always a composer, never a merchant in facile effects without causes, and the two sets of "Aventures" propound musical relationships that are absorbing and delightful to listen to (as many who own the excellent Heliodor recording have discovered).

Ligeti originally thought of the "Aventures" as concert music, but they have several times been staged, at least twice by the composer himself. The publisher will even supply, at extra cost, a printed scenario, extraordinarily complicated mechanically and visually, which represents Ligeti's own first and subsequently rejected staging. In terms of what is really true, then, the "Aventures" have no scenario any more than they have a libretto in the conventional sense. The texts in their musical setting, however, are constantly suggestive of some sort of affect or confrontation, and what Ian Strasfogel has done in his brilliant, admirably simple and very funny staging is to make visible what he has heard.

In Douglas Schmidt's set, a trap-like receding box whose converging walls and ceiling are traversed by perspective lines, four young singers, Syble Young, Joyce Castle, David Holloway and Poppy Holden, do a super-virtuosic job of singing and a very good one of flinging themselves about. Martin Smith did an obvibusly very complete job of musical preparation, and the performance I saw was superbly paced by conductor Gunther Schuller, and excellently played by the Berkshire Music Center's students (the playing included tearing paper, rubbing piano strings with a hairbrush, and breaking a Coke bottle with a hammer). A wonderful work, wonderfully performed.

*

Erik Satie was not one of the 20th century's great composers, but "Socrate," a series of settings for high voice and small orchestra of passages from Plato's "Symposium," "Phaedrus," and "Phaedo," is one of the century's great works. It seems to me so chaste a masterpiece as to resist the kind of concretization that is the effect of a staging (or even of the division, for example, of Phaedo's narrative of Socrates' death among several singers to indicate the different personages). Strasfogel's staging was, in fact, as discreet as possible, except perhaps insofar as he both veiled and heightened the homosexual bias of the text by assigning the male parts of Alcibiades and Phaedrus to a strikingly attractive, sexually aware young woman at whom Socrates, in white pajamas, smiled sweetly and without cease.

"Socrate," too, was beautifully conducted by Schuller, with particularly effective singing, though rather too much mugging, by Barbara Hocher as Phaedo, and an almost very good performance, marred by too punchy and Broadwayish a delivery, from Doris Peterson in those two AC-DC roles. The whole performance, indeed, leaned towards an openness that, for all its obvious and undeniable advantages, went against that mesmeric, understated quality in which I find the work's essence. Part of that openness was in the use of an English text by Yale Marshall and Wesley Balk, and while "Socrate" must be, like "Pelléas," one of the most bafflingly untranslatable things in the world, the two men have done an amazing job of dealing with the impossible.

Harrison Birtwistle's "dramatic pastoral," as he calls "Down by the Greenwood Side," is based on a libretto collated from the Elizabethan "Mummers' Play" and a ballad called "The Cruel Mother." So, at least, I learned later from a program note that was not available at the first performance (the American premiere), and I daresay it might have been of some help to know that at the time and, even more, to be actually acquainted with the sources, as some members of an educated English audience might be. Having nothing to go on but the title and the action itself as it unfolded, I saw only a violent and funny series of events in which St. George was twice killed and twice resurrected, and through which there wandered a coloratura infanticide called Mrs. Green.

Continued on Page 26

Continued from Page 11

The work is economical, with the roles—except for that of the unsatisfactory mother—being speaking parts, and with the few instruments producing a rather neutral soundtrack of punctuations and underlinings. As his full-length opera, "Punch and Judy," has made clear, Birtwistle is an unusually gifted composer for the theater and one with a highly developed, engaging penchant for the grotesque.

"Down by the Greenwood Side" was inventively staged by Strasfogel, dressed in appropriate shreds and patches (and proper Victorian mourning for Mrs. Green) by Jeanne Button, and conducted with great concentration by Bruno Maderna. There were outstanding performances by Barbara Hocher as the shrill lady and by Stephen Klein as Father Christmas, who functions as master of ceremonies and evangelist for this grim tale.

*

For a soprano like Syble Young, who had never done anything farther out than Ann's Cabaletta in "Rake's Progress," to find previously undiscovered pieces of her voice as she learns to gurgle Ligeti, for all the young singers in the Music Theater Project to become involved in a different sort of acting or to be put into speaking parts, to work in a physical setting that makes it virtually impossible for them to see their conductors (who were, however, watching them extremely closely), to work with men like Schuller and Maderna—all that must have been a stretching part of their professional training.

And for the listeners, the work of the Music Theater Project was a welcome assertion of life in the middle of a contemporary music bash which, in its orchestral and chamber works, was, on the whole, quite depressing. At one point, unbidden, there came into my mind that photograph on the P.D.Q. Bach record showing a fur-hatted, triumphantly smiling Professor Peter Schickele standing by a garbage can from which he has just extracted a musical manuscript, and I saw it suddenly as a picture of Gunther Schuller putting this year's Fromm Festival program together.

Composers John Harbison, Sydney Hodkinson, John Heiss, Charles Wuorinen and Schuller himself were represented by interesting works, and I have, at the time of writing, not yet heard the pieces by Edward Levy and Betsy Jolas. But most of what went on was, to begin with, in no possible sense of the word a festival, and it came across as a terrible parade of the mindless, the fraudulent, the desperately inept, and the dead.

At the opposite end of the estate, where the big Music Shed is, Seiji Ozawa, now finishing his second year as Artistic Director of Tanglewood, has begun to achieve remarkable things; there is no doubt though, that the artistic sickness and the leadership crisis of the host organization here, the badly mismanaged Boston Symphony, has taken its toll on the operations of the Berkshire Music Center as well.

The Fromm Festival has reached something close to a zero point this year, but the Fromm Foundation celebrates its 20th anniversary next year, an opportunity for Paul Fromm, its president, and for Schuller to take a deep breath and push that once so stimulating festival back to life again.

Michael Steinberg is music critic of The Boston Globe.

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC
1971
Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and
The Fromm Music Foundation, Paul Fromm, President

RE. 8/7/71

Wednesday, August 11, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Monday, August 16, 8:30 p.m.
JOHN HUGGLER	Music in Two Parts, Op. 63 (1964)'
JOHN HARBISON	Parody-Fantasia (1968)
+*LOUIS SMITH WEINGARDEN	Seven Poems of Constantine 'Cavafy (1971)
DONALD MARTINO	Cinque Frammenti (1962)
+VINCENT LUTI	Cantata: Desiderata (1968)
ROLV YTTREHUS	Music for Winds, Percussion, 'Cello and Voices (1969)
Wednesday, August 11, 8:30 p.m.	West Barn
Thursday, August 12, 8:30 p.m.
/HARRISON BIRTWISTLE	Down by the Greenwood Side
ERIK SATIE	Socrates (Socrate)
GYORGY LIGETI	Adventures (Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures)
Thursday, August 12, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Tuesday, August 17, 8:30 p.m.
EDWARD LEVY	Quintet (1967)
BETSY JOLAS	Tranche (1967)
GILLES TREMBLAY	Souffles (Champs II) (1968)
+*T. J. ANDERSON	Transitions (1971)
/BRUNO MADERNA	Oboe Concerto (1962)
GUNTHER SCHULLER	Double Quintet (1961)
Sunday, August 15, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Gunther Schuller conducting
CHARLES IVES	Yale-Princeton Game (1899) Gen'l Slocum (1904)
SYDNEY HODKINSON	Valence for Chamber Orchestra (1970)
/GIACINTO SCELSI	Anahit for Violin and Orchestra (1965)
JOHN HEISS	Four Short Pieces for Chamber Orchestra (1962)
CHARLES WUORINEN	Contrafactum-Parts I and II (1969)

*Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation
+First Performance
/First American Performance

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 18 1971 New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Fromm Festival introduces Weingarden's 'Seven Poems'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The Fromm Foundation's annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood began Wednesday of last week with a program then repeated on Monday, and which included works of John Huggler, John Harbison, Donald Martino. Louis Weingarden, Vincent Luti, and Rolf Rolv Yttrehus.

Weingarden's "Seven Poems of Constantine Cavafy" was commissioned for the festival by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center, and the performance last Wednesday was its first. Weingarden is a gifted composer; one, that is, who knows how to produce a plausible or even a strikingly effective musical continuity, and one whose work has a quite a lot of attractive surface detail.

Just the same, "Seven Poems" seems a thinly composed piece, and also an evasive one in that the whole challenge of text setting is bypassed by the composer's decision to have the words spoken rather than sung. The rest, which is for a bizzarely high, wordless soprano and for an ensemble of solo strings, harp, piano, and percussion, tends to recede and become background, pretty, but failing to turn into a piece. Stephen Klein read Cavafy's sleazy erotic fantasies as if embarassed by them, which I though spoke well for him even though it did the performance little good; the others, soprano Poppi Holden, and the ensemble under the direction of John Mauceri, did their jobs well.

The other work having its first performance was Vincent Luti's cantata, "Desiderata," which makes a confused and uninteresting hubub out of the antiphonal juxtaposition of extracts from the proceedings of the Salem witch trials and from an unctuous sermon of the same period. Gunther Schuller conducted, and the soloists were Joan Heller, D'anna Fortunato, and Robert Shiesley.

For the rest, there was Huggler's "Music in Two Parts," pleasant in sonority but rhythmically stiff (Paul Polivnick concucting); Martino's "Cinque Framenti," which are lightweight and tiny duets for oboe and bass) thank Charnley, Richard Fletcher); and the academic serialism of "music for winds, percussion, cello, and voices" by Yttehus (Tibor Pusztai conducting). The one really engaging piece was Harbison's delicately witty 'Parody-Phantasia," though the effect of the piece itself and of Robert Miller's fine playing of it was destroyed Wednesday by the racket made by one of the other composer's children.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 14 1971 New England Newsclip

New music at Lenox

Fromm-BMC works

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood's inner festival of contemporary music, cosponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, has been in full swing during the past week with the menu as before—one man's meat and another's poison.

Seventeen pieces of 20th-century instrumental music have been on the schedule (with the Charles Ives "Yale-Princeton Football Game" of 1899 just barely falling short of the goal line), along with three musical theater pieces of avant-garde persuasion marking the return of the genus operaticus to the Berkshire festival fold.

What seems most apparent from one official concert and the rehearsal of part of another is the surprising absence of inventiveness among the liberated composers in their new freedom, and the reliance on a handful of trite compositional devices which already are tiresomely old-fashioned. The trenchant pauses, the plucked piano strings and the tapping of instrumental wood, the whirrs and the wheezes, the gulping tape, and the prodigal use of instruments for infinitesimal returns, all made their reappearance in some but not all of the pieces.

Two BMC-Fromm commissioned works had first performances — Louis Smith Weingarden's "Seven Poems of Constantine Cavafy," and T J Anderson's "Transitions." Both leaned heavily on the new technical vocabulary and both made prodigal use of performers considering what finally emerged.

Mr. Weingarden had plenty of percussion, for which he writes interestingly, but which mostly obscured the narrator of the poems and covered the soprano vocalise passages and those for strings, piano, and harp.

Mr. Anderson's "Transitions," which were terse and sharp with instrumental contrasts, added up to give a first impression of being a series of rhapsodic fragments, conveyed in brilliant, splayed sound, and, not just incidentally, strikingly performed by an alert group of 10 under a sharply aware young conductor, Charles Darden.

A Bruno Maderna oboe concerto, with the markedly gifted Peter Bowman as soloist, had its American premiere on the second program, and proved to be expertly crafted, if somewhat random in its use of large forces including two pianos, three percussion batteries, strings, winds, and brass.

However, Vincent Luti's cantata, "Desiderata," and Gilles Tremblay's "Souffles" — both composed in 1968, the former a first performance — demonstrated, of all the works, that much can be made of new musical means to achieve telling audience impact. Sensitively conducted by Gunther Schuller the Luti cantata is a startingly dramatic dialogue composed of excerpts from a 17th-century sermon text, and quotations from the Salem witchcraft trials — the former sung by three fine soloists, soprano Joan Heller, mezzo D'Anna Fortunato and baritone Robert Shiesley; the latter hissed, hummed, and barked by an adept chorus of eight mixed voices. Each was backed by its own string quartet, with winds and percussion to pull it all together — one of the few instances where form and content emerged naturally allied. On the theatrical basis it would seem that Mr. Luti has promise of having an opera in him.

'Souffles'

Mr. Tremblay's "Souffles" makes it appear that he has a fiercely uncoiling tonal watchspring in him. Scored for 12 players fanned out across the stage with their excellent conductor, Thomas Michalak, in the center, "Souffles" begins with a percussive whisper, but before you know it, bursts, flashes, and gigantic fireworks are exploding all over the place. On first hearing it was an absorbing, exciting experience, expertly played and impeccably controlled.

As a matter of fact, an outstanding observation to be made of these contemporary concerts is the skill of the young Berkshire Music Center musicians who perform in all categories. While veteran instrumentalists have been known to give up on new scores in derision and frustration, these youngsters meet the most difficult problems with a relaxed and assured attitude that is inspiring to hear and see. Even if one cannot usually sing along with anything that is found on a BMC-Fromm program, the vitality of the performances and of at least a handful of the new works makes it all worth while. There are three more evenings remaining—a BMC Orchestra concert directed by Mr. Schuller on Sunday (Aug. 15) and repetitions of the two earlier programs on Aug. 16 and 17.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Schuller at Lenox

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Sunday evening, as part of the Fromm Foundation's Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood, Gunther Schuller conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a program of music by Charles Ives, Sydney Hodkinson, Giacinto Scelsi, John Heiss, and Charles Wuorinen.

Wuorinen's piece, called "Contrafactum" is a transformation for orchestra of "Time's Encomium," the electronic piece he wrote two years ago for Nonesuch Records and which won him the 1970 Pulitzer Prize.

The Canadian-born Hodkinsen, now at the University of Michigan, and John Heiss, 33, and the faculty of the New England Conservatory, are paragons of modesty. Hodkinsen's "Valence for Chamber Orchestra" is a short crescendo and decrescendo, moving also from fragments to compactness and back to fragments, strikingly scored for an idiosyncratically placed ensemble that allows for telling antiphonal effects, a study, as its title suggests, in the capacity of its materials usually to unite, react, and interact, Hodkinson, moreover, knows how to draw you into a piece and keep you there: it was a pleasure.

The concert began with two short pieces by Ives, recently reconstructed by Schuller. One was "the Yale-Princeton Football Game, 1899" (Princeton won 11-10, and the program notes didn't tell about that either), which is a single piece of descriptive music; the other was "the Gen'l. Slocum," depicting the blowing up of an excursion steamer in New York harbor in 1904, better than Yale-Princeton, but also only stuff Ives did much better elsewhere. Performance standards were commendalbe all evening.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Contemporary Music (III)

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE THIRD program of the Festival of Contemporary Music being presented at the Berkshire Music Center under the patronage of the Fromm Music Center was played last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Gunther Schuller, artistic director, conducted the center orchestra in a program of music by Charles Ives, Sydney Hodkinson, Giacinto Scelsi, John Heiss, and Charles Wuorinen.

Although Ives died at age 80, only 17 years ago, the two entries of his output heard last night are of his early vintage, and had been neglected entirely for 70 years until last year. "The Yale-Princeton Football Game" 1899, the composition, not the game, and "The General Slocum," a boat that exploded in New York Harbor in 1904, are descriptive pieces of a clever, witty man. A reputation for world-shaking originality could not be devised on these examples alone. They are more the material for a P.D.Q. Bach program, ingenious results of a keen musical mind with a volatile sense of humor.

* * *

HODKINSON'S "Valence," a term used in chemistry, the program explains, employs a small ensemble placed in two smaller units for antiphonal purposes. The Scelsi Anahit for violin and orchestra had Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The violin is tuned to an arbitrary system of relationships, and is then sounded in tight, contiguous intervals to establish antagonistic vibrations stepped up by a microphone.

* * *

JOHN HEISS desired his self-sufficient "Four Short Pieces" to be understood as contributing to a larger structure of freely atonal units.

Wuorinen had put the audience on its guard in the program notes that his "Contrafactum-Parts I and II, 1969," was a recasting of material present in his electronic work, "Time's Encomium." The composer adds that "Temporal proportions and articulation are newly composed, and a range of timbral possibilities, not available electronically, is explored. For the rest, Contrafactum follows my recent preoccupation with centric applications of the twelvetone system, and my concern with formal unfolding derived from the interval succession of the set on which the work is based."

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC
1971
Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and
The Fromm Music Foundation, Paul Fromm, President

B.E. 8/2/71

Wednesday, August 11, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Monday, August 16, 8:30 p.m.
JOHN HUGGLER	Music in Two Parts, Op. 63 (1964)
JOHN HARBISON	Parody-Fantasia (1968)
+*LOUIS SMITH WEINGARDEN	Seven Poems of Constantine 'Cavafy (1971)
DONALD MARTINO	Cinque Frammenti (1962)
+VINCENT LUTI	Cantata: Desiderata (1968)
ROLV YTTREHUS	Music for Winds, Percussion, 'Cello and Voices (1969)
Wednesday, August 11, 8:30 p.m.	West Barn
Thursday, August 12, 8:30 p.m.
/HARRISON BIRTWISTLE	Down by the Greenwood Side
ERIK SATIE	Socrates (Socrate)
GYORGY LIGETI	Adventures (Aventures et Nouvelles Aventures)
Thursday, August 12, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Tuesday, August 17, 8:30 p.m.
EDWARD LEVY	Quintet (1967)
BETSY JOLAS	Tranche (1967)
GILLES TREMBLAY	Souffles (Champs II) (1968)
+*T. J. ANDERSON	Transitions (1971)
/BRUNO MADERNA	Oboe Concerto (1962)
GUNTHER SCHULLER	Double Quintet (1961)
Sunday, August 15, 8:30 p.m.	Theatre Concert Hall
Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Gunther Schuller conducting
CHARLES IVES	Yale-Princeton Game (1899) Gen'l Slocum (1904)
SYDNEY HODKINSON	Valence for Chamber Orchestra (1970)
/GIACINTO SCELSI	Anahit for Violin and Orchestra (1965)
JOHN HEISS	Four Short Pieces for Chamber Orchestra (1962)
CHARLES WUORINEN	Contrafactum-Parts I and II (1969)

*Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation
+First Performance
/First American Performance

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 18 1971
New England Newsclip

THEATER / ARTS

Fromm Festival introduces Weingarden's 'Seven Poems'

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The Fromm Foundation's annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood began Wednesday of last week with a program then repeated on Monday, and which included works of John Huggler, John Harbison, Donald Martino, Louis Weingarden, Vincent Luti, and Rolf Rolv Yttrehus.

Weingarden's "Seven Poems of Constantine Cavafy" was commissioned for the festival by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center, and the performance last Wednesday was its first. Weingarden is a gifted composer; one, that is, who knows how to produce a plausible or even a strikingly effective musical continuity, and one whose work has a quite a lot of attractive surface detail.

Just the same, "Seven Poems" seems a thinly composed piece, and also an evasive one in that the whole challenge of text setting is bypassed by the composer's decision to have the words spoken rather than sung. The rest, which is for a bizzarely high, wordless soprano and for an ensemble of solo strings, harp, piano, and percussion, tends to recede and become background, pretty, but failing to turn into a piece. Stephen Klein read Cavafy's sleazy erotic fantasies as if embarassed by them, which I though spoke well for him even though it did the performance little good; the others, soprano Poppi Holden, and the ensemble under the direction of John Mauceri, did their jobs well.

The other work having its first performance was Vincent Luti's cantata, "Desiderata," which makes a confused and uninteresting hubub out of the antiphonal juxtaposition of extracts from the proceedings of the Salem witch trials and from an unctuous sermon of the same period. Gunther Schuller conducted, and the soloists were Joan Heller, D'anna Fortunato, and Robert Shiesley.

For the rest, there was Huggler's "Music in Two Parts," pleasant in sonority but rhythmically stiff (Paul Polivnick concucting); Martino's "Cinque Framenti," which are lightweight and tiny duets for oboe and bass) thank Charnley, Richard Fletcher); and the academic serialism of "music for winds, percussion, cello, and voices" by Yttehus (Tibor Pusztai conducting). The one really engaging piece was Harbison's delicately witty 'Parody-Phantasia," though the effect of the piece itself and of Robert Miller's fine playing of it was destroyed Wednesday by the racket made by one of the other composer's children.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
AUG 14 1971
New England Newsclip

New music at Lenox

Fromm-BMC works

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Tanglewood's inner festival of contemporary music, cosponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, has been in full swing during the past week with the menu as before—one man's meat and another's poison.

Seventeen pieces of 20th-century instrumental music have been on the schedule (with the Charles Ives "Yale-Princeton Football Game" of 1899 just barely falling short of the goal line), along with three musical theater pieces of avant-garde persuasion marking the return of the genus operaticus to the Berkshire festival fold.

What seems most apparent from one official concert and the rehearsal of part of another is the surprising absence of inventiveness among the liberated composers in their new freedom, and the reliance on a handful of trite compositional devices which already are tiresomely old-fashioned. The trenchant pauses, the plucked piano strings and the tapping of instrumental wood, the whirrs and the wheezes, the gulping tape, and the prodigal use of instruments for infinitesimal returns, all made their reappearance in some but not all of the pieces.

Two BMC-Fromm commissioned works had first performances — Louis Smith Weingarden's "Seven Poems of Constantine Cavafy," and T J Anderson's "Transitions." Both leaned heavily on the new technical vocabulary and both made prodigal use of performers considering what finally emerged.

Mr. Weingarden had plenty of percussion, for which he writes interestingly, but which mostly obscured the narrator of the poems and covered the soprano vocalise passages and those for strings, piano, and harp.

Mr. Anderson's "Transitions," which were terse and sharp with instrumental contrasts, added up to give a first impression of being a series of rhapsodic fragments, conveyed in brilliant, splayed sound, and, not just incidentally, strikingly performed by an alert group of 10 under a sharply aware young conductor, Charles Darden.

A Bruno Maderna oboe concerto, with the markedly gifted Peter Bowman as soloist, had its American premiere on the second program, and proved to be expertly crafted, if somewhat random in its use of large forces including two pianos, three percussion batteries, strings, winds, and brass.

However, Vincent Luti's cantata, "Desiderata," and Gilles Tremblay's "Souffles" — both composed in 1968, the former a first performance — demonstrated, of all the works, that much can be made of new musical means to achieve telling audience impact. Sensitively conducted by Gunther Schuller the Luti cantata is a startingly dramatic dialogue composed of excerpts from a 17th-century sermon text, and quotations from the Salem witchcraft trials — the former sung by three fine soloists, soprano Joan Heller, mezzo D'Anna Fortunato and baritone Robert Shiesley; the latter hissed, hummed, and barked by an adept chorus of eight mixed voices. Each was backed by its own string quartet, with winds and percussion to pull it all together — one of the few instances where form and content emerged naturally allied. On the theatrical basis it would seem that Mr. Luti has promise of having an opera in him.

'Souffles'

Mr. Tremblay's "Souffles" makes it appear that he has a fiercely uncoiling tonal watchspring in him. Scored for 12 players fanned out across the stage with their excellent conductor, Thomas Michalak, in the center, "Souffles" begins with a percussive whisper, but before you know it, bursts, flashes, and gigantic fireworks are exploding all over the place. On first hearing it was an absorbing, exciting experience, expertly played and impeccably controlled.

As a matter of fact, an outstanding observation to be made of these contemporary concerts is the skill of the young Berkshire Music Center musicians who perform in all categories. While veteran instrumentalists have been known to give up on new scores in derision and frustration, these youngsters meet the most difficult problems with a relaxed and assured attitude that is inspiring to hear and see. Even if one cannot usually sing along with anything that is found on a BMC-Fromm program, the vitality of the performances and of at least a handful of the new works makes it all worth while. There are three more evenings remaining—a BMC Orchestra concert directed by Mr. Schuller on Sunday (Aug. 15) and repetitions of the two earlier programs on Aug. 16 and 17.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 17 1971
New England Newsclip

Schuller at Lenox

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Sunday evening, as part of the Fromm Foundation's Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood, Gunther Schuller conducted the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a program of music by Charles Ives, Sydney Hodkinson, Giacinto Scelsi, John Heiss, and Charles Wuorinen.

Wuorinen's piece, called "Contrafactum" is a transformation for orchestra of "Time's Encomium," the electronic piece he wrote two years ago for Nonesuch Records and which won him the 1970 Pulitzer Prize.

The Canadian-born Hodkinsen, now at the University of Michigan, and John Heiss, 33, and the faculty of the New England Conservatory, are paragons of modesty. Hodkinsen's "Valence for Chamber Orchestra" is a short crescendo and decrescendo, moving also from fragments to compactness and back to fragments, strikingly scored for an idiosyncratically placed ensemble tha allows for telling antiphonal effects, a study, as its title suggests, in the capacity of its materials usually to unite, react, and interact, Hodkinson, moreover, knows how to draw you into a piece and keep you there: it was a pleasure.

The concert began with two short pieces by Ives, recently reconstructed by Schuller. One was "the Yale-Princeton Football Game, 1899" (Princeton won 11-10, and the program notes didn't tell about that either), which is a single piece of descriptive music; the other was "the Gen'l. Slocum," depicting the blowing up of an excursion steamer in New York harbor in 1904, better than Yale-Princeton, but also only stuff Ives did much better elsewhere. Performance standards were commendalbe all evening.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Music Review

Contemporary Music (III)

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE THIRD program of the Festival of Contemporary Music being presented at the Berkshire Music Center under the patronage of the Fromm Music Center was played last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Gunther Schuller, artistic director, conducted the center orchestra in a program of music by Charles Ives, Sydney Hodkinson, Giacinto Scelsi, John Heiss, and Charles Wuorinen.

Although Ives died at age 80, only 17 years ago, the two entries of his output heard last night are of his early vintage, and had been neglected entirely for 70 years until last year. "The Yale-Princeton Football Game" 1899, the composition, not the game, and "The General Slocum," a boat that exploded in New York Harbor in 1904, are descriptive pieces of a clever, witty man. A reputation for world-shaking originality could not be devised on these examples alone. They are more the material for a P.D.Q. Bach program, ingenious results of a keen musical mind with a volatile sense of humor.

* * *

HODKINSON'S "Valence," a term used in chemistry, the program explains, employs a small ensemble placed in two smaller units for antiphonal purposes. The Scelsi Anahit for violin and orchestra had Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The violin is tuned to an arbitrary system of relationships, and is then sounded in tight, contiguous intervals to establish antagonistic vibrations stepped up by a microphone.

* * *

JOHN HEISS desired his self-sufficient "Four Short Pieces" to be understood as contributing to a larger structure of freely atonal units.

Wuorinen had put the audience on its guard in the program notes that his "Contrafactum-Parts I and II, 1969," was a recasting of material present in his electronic work, "Time's Encomium." The composer adds that "Temporal proportions and articulation are newly composed, and a range of timbral possibilities, not available electronically, is explored. For the rest, Contrafactum follows my recent preoccupation with centric applications of the twelvetone system, and my concern with formal unfolding derived from the interval succession of the set on which the work is based."

130

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 12 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Review

First Fromm Program

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FESTIVAL of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, initiated in 1963, gave its first program of this year in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night. Gunther Schuller, head of the fellowship program of contemporary music activities, has pointed out that, thanks to the inestimable support of the Fromm Foundation, it "provides a forum for new ideas and directions in music." No other philanthropic agency is so directly involved in furthering a project of this nature.

There were six composers represented on last night's list. A Parady-Fantasia for Piano by John Harbison was played by Robert Miller; and a duet by Donald Martino was played by Richard Fletcher on bass and Frank Charnley on oboe. In addition, compositions for various larger ensembles, employing 10 or more participants, were also featured.

If one may engage in generalities, it might be said that this whole program, as an example of what is being produced today, demands more from the audience than music of a past generation, which soothed and even became somnifacient. The listener must be on the qui vive, and must supply the pictures or the coloration.

* * *

FOR INSTANCE, the Harbison Parody, for me, was an animation of a graph of the stock market in the last couple years, with jagged peaks and valleys of sound, urgent, hysterical, and restless. On the other hand, the Martino "Cinque Frammenti" might have been a dialogue on an academic subject if the bass had not put so much fervor into it, making one think it has an element of emotion.

But there is a possible indictment of the works for larger groups in that the individual parts are poverty-stricken. The respective conductors act as might a French chef preparing his most delicious concoction, here demanding a pinch of seasoning from a string, there another from a wind, further on a more massive component from the percussion. The listener hears the finished product and well may savor it, but the musicians are treated as herbs and spices and rarely have a luscious morsel to contribute or consume.

These are experimental sessions, testing both the composers and the listeners, and certain factors become apparent. Nothing played last night was for conventional instrumentation, and that in itself is progress and encouraging. There is no reason why what one may have to say musically must be shaped in the culinary pots and pans which have served for endless string quartets and quintets for ages. The new potentialities are infinite and largely unexplored. The problem is to convey and convince us in the audience of the significance of the message.

* * *

THE YOUTHFUL composers bring impressive dossiers to their art, having studied and researched in depth. Whether their yield may often sound fragmentary or sporadic is for the audience to fathom. There are examples of new sculpture on the lawns of Tanglewood and another in the new mall at Pittsfield; there are abstractions on the walls of museums everywhere. If these were the aberrations of untrained and artistically limited individuals, we might ignore or accept them with indifference, but these as were the offerings on this first Fromm program are serious and informed efforts and deserve every ounce of credence men of good will possess.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

AUG 20 1971

New England Newsclip

Quintet impresses at Fromm festival

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Last Thursday's concert (repeated Tuesday) of the Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood included recent works by relatively little-known composers and also pieces by Bruno Maderna and Gunther Schuller, the former on the composition and conducting faculty at the Berkshire Music Center this summer, the latter artistic co-director of Tanglewood and head of the center's fellowship program in contemporary music activities.

The most impressive of the first group of pieces was a quintet for viola, bass, flute, alto saxophone, and percussion, by Edward Levy, who lists Dizzy Gillespie as a strong early influence and Ralph Shapey, Stefan Wolpe, and Milton Babbitt as his later teachers. The quintet, written in 1967 and orthodox New York serialism in facture, draws much of its individuality from its sonority: those instruments resolutely, even aggressively, refuse to blend, and the excited, explosive gestures in the music come across like an inevitable result of the tough, abrasive sound. It is flailing fifths music, very engaging, and admirable for its economy of statement. Paul Zukofsky conducted what seemed to be a rather stiff performance.

"Tramche," a piece for solo harp by Betsy Jolas, a French composer now in her 40s and formerly a pupil of Milhaud Messiaen, turned out to be just another piece of French conservatory harp music. "Souffles" by the Canadian composer, Gilles Tremblay, had some amusing instrumental fireworks in it, but was otherwise unrewarding.

T.J. Anderson's "Transitions," commissioned for the festival, was a painfully amateurish piece whose incoherence was not made more convincing by the composer's attempt in his program note to pass it off as "the adaptation of pluralistic values." Karen Krifel was the harpist in "Tranche," and Thomas Michalak and Charles Darden were the conductors respectively for Tremblay and Anderson.

Schuller's "Double quintet," written in 1961 for the standard woodwind and brass quintet, is, like his "music for violin, piano and percussion," played here earlier this summer, and like "Spectra," done by the Boston Symphony last year, a fine example of his concern with finding a strong, mutually nourishing relation between an idiomatic, virtuosic instrumental surface and a cohesive compositional interior. Maderna's oboe concerto, in which the soloist plays Oboe D'amore and English horn as well as the ordinary oboe, is obviously the purposeful product of the most refined sort of professionalism, to which I can add only the subjective observation that there is something in the adagio temperament of this music and in that long succession of isolated notes to which I cannot respond.

Schuller and Maderna conducted each other's work, and Peter Bowman was the able soloist in the concerto.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 61,977
AUG 14 1971
New England Newsclip

New Music Festival at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Statistics continue to prove that 10 per cent of new music survives and that's just about the way it seemed Thursday night in the theater concert hall at Tanglewood in the third of five programs, last Wednesday through next Tuesday, of the ninth annual Festival of Contemporary Music.

Sponsor is the Berkshire Music Center, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Thursday night's music was written from 1961 to this year.

Since time is the only reliable judge of a musical work, we can but suspect that the likely-to-endure opus is Bruno Maderna's Oboe Concerto, composed in 1962. It received its first United States performance.

Boston Symphony

The fact that Maderna conducted the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival this summer and was the most famous name on the program has little if anything to do with the quality of his oboe concerto.

A more pertinent factor was the splendid performance by oboe soloist Peter Bowman of Keene, N.H. Gunther Schuller's conducting was at the same level of excellence.

Maderna's loosely-structured work focuses a affluently melodic solo line against a wide spectrum of backgrounds ranging from fragile, veiled sounds to a pummelled climax on four kettledrums.

The orchestral background by 22 instruments, including two pianos, was played with a respect and dedication that one does not always experience with the Boston Symphony that plays across the campus in the music shed.

Total Effort

No matter how irritating or challenging if gullability, the devotion and total effort that the center students expend on music of this generation enforces an attentive ear and open mind.

Most rebellious on Thursday night's fare was Gilles Tremblay's "Souffls" (breaths), from Champs 11 (Fields).

The young Canadian based his tonal dissertation on psalm 144; "Man is like unto a breath, his days are like the shadows that vanish."

Thomas Michalak's conducting left little to be desired. Except for a trumpeter who required two cues for one entrance, the 13 woodwinds and brasses were kept au courrant of their moves.

Ferocity

The trick was to relate to the next's instrumental ferocities keyboard assaults, din, clatter and periodically beautiful reed solos.

Another enigmatic abstraction, was Edward Levy's quintet for viola, bass, flute, alto saxophine and percussion.

Melody seemed present only by default. On the plus side were vital rhythms juxtaposed against brief lapses into bucolic substance.

Yet the tonal mixtures were rich, sometimes acrid, never dull. The conductor was Paul Zukofsky.

Program Patter

Composer T.J. Anderson offered polysyllabic program patter to lucidate the motives behind his "Transitions," commissioned by the festival's sponsors and premiered Thursday night.

To avert confusion, Anderson related his works to "adaptation of pluralistic values," a genetic state of flux in which the listener moves back and forth between secular and non-secular materials.

This must have been what conductor Thomas Michalak and the 10 instrumentalists were engaged in. Many contemporary composers protest judgment of the music after a first hearing unless, or course, the appraisal is favorable.

For this listener at least, a second hearing of "Transitions" might only compound the fracture.

PROGRAM

Quintet	Levy
Tranche	Jolas
Souffles (Champs 11)	Tremblay
Transitions	Anderson
Oboe Concerto	Maderna
Double Quintet	Schuller

It is much easier to praise Karen Krisel's (from Philadelphia) playing of Betsy Jolas' "Tranche" for solo harp than to applaud the work itself.

The musical message may have been concealed beneath the surface. Its mystical improvisations were sufficient to identify Miss Kriselos lexterous technique, sensitivity and musicianship.

All of which reflects great credit on the experimenters in contemporary composition. Without them there would be no culfinators.

HERALD
RUTLAND, VT.
D. 22,553
JUN 25 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Will Try to Be Less Popular

185

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — In a move to avoid programs that would attract the last two years' crods of 20,000-plus, the Berkshitre Music Center at Tanglewood has announced a ~~change of~~ focus for its "contemporary trends concerts" this summer.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood artistic director, aong with Seiji Ozawa, announced Thursday a series of four concerts offering everything from jazz to country and western music, "introducing new forms and trends" in music. The dates are July 6, 13, 20 and Aug. 10.

In addition to the 5,000 seat music shed, a smaller 1,000 seat theater will be used in presenting performances by the various groups each night.

Two years ago The Who, Jefferson Airplane and B. B. King were all packed into one Tanglewood program, drawing a massive audience of 23,000, and strangling the narrow lanes that lead to the festival grounds.

The Berkshire Music Center opens June 28 for 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and abroad who will study during the intensive eight-week summer program.

The Boston Symphony begins its summer concert schedule at Tanglewood July 2, with Ozawa conducting Bach.

Tanglewood is a 210 acre estate given to the Boston Symphony in the 30's and was once the home of author Nathaniel Hawthorne.

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS

Contemporary Trends Concerts Announced

Eagle 6/29/71

The fourth season of the Contemporary Trends series at Tanglewood will feature a variety of music, including rock, classical jazz and country and western. This year the concerts will be held in both the Shed and Theatre-Concert Hall, with the larger groups performing in the 5,000-seat Shed. A single ticket will admit the purchaser to all events on the evening's program.

The first Trends concert, July 6, features guitarist-composer Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw and his six-piece band, and jazz-flutist Jeremy Steig. Kershaw specializes in Cajun music, which is native to rural Louisiana.

Feliciano

Jose Feliciano, guitarist-composer whose most popular work is "Light My Fire," will appear July 13. Gospel singer Marion Williams and the Winter Consort, an ensemble which does classical works in a jazz vein, will also appear on the program.

P.D.Q. Bach will conclude the series Aug. 10. Prof. Peter Schickele will deliver historical annotations supporting the worthiness of this least-known member of the Bach family, and Joseph Silverstein will conduct the Boston Symphony in some of the composer's works.

The jazz-rock group Blood, Sweat and Tears was to appear on the Trends program for July 20 but has been forced to cancel. The program that day will be announced later.

All concerts are set to begin at 6 p.m.

OIL CITY, PA.
DERRICK
D. 15,000
APR 10 1971

Contemporary Trend Concert To Be Focal Point On Fanfare

Since 1937, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, a green and wooded estate in the Massachusetts Berkshire mountains, has been the summer home of the stately Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concerts performed there during its annual music festivals have attracted eminent "long hair" musicians and audiences from all over the world.

In 1968, however, the Berkshire Music Center inaugurated "The Contemporary Trends Concerts," under director Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and head of the contemporary music activities at Tanglewood.

ONE SUCH concert, "Jazz at Tanglewood," is the focal point on Fanfare, to be aired at 10 p.m. Sunday on WQED-TV, Channel 13.

Folksinger Judy Collins and the Don Ellis Orchestra, perform widely-acclaimed contemporary elections demonstrating new concert trends.

Miss Collins sings a group of her most popular songs. Included are, "Chelsea Morning," "Suzanne," "Bird," "Hard Loving Loser," and "In My Life." She provides her own accompament on the guitar.

Born in Seattle, Washington, Miss Collins originally trained to be a concert pianist but later turned to the guitar.

AS ONE OF the leaders in the revival of interest in the folk idiom, she is now known throughout the world and has performed in England, Poland, Russia, Australia and New Zealand, as well as in many parts of the United States.

The Don Ellis Orchestra is considered by many critics among the great jazz ensembles of our time. Selections performed on the program include, "K C Blues," "Open Beauty," and "Indian Lady."

TANGLEWOOD is no stranger to Ellis. While at Boston Univesity, he majored in composition and began playing the trumpet at the Berklee School. He had his first glimpse of the music center when his instructor, John Coffey, a member of the Boston Symphony, took Ellis to study at the festival's summer academy.

When he finished his graduate studies, he formed a band which performed to new rhythmic ideas he had learned from his studies of Indian music. His band became faous after an appearance at the Monterey Jazz Festival.

The program closes amid group conversations of Miss Collins and Ellis among students presently studying at the Berkshire Music Academy. Both discuss the relationship of toay's music with emphasis on the classics.

132

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 7 1971
New England Newsclip

Whitestone

Slick country westerners Atkins, Henry Strelikus, right, and conductor Albert Coleman.

Music Review

Guitarist Atkins Opens Trends

By JOHN A. SCHWEIZER

A SPARSE crowd of 3,449 persons—many of them admitted free—turned out for the first Contemporary Trends program of the season at Tanglewood last night.

Guitarist Chet Atkins barely salvaged what was left of audience patience after sound-system difficulties and "show biz" antics during Doug Kershaw's Cajun music segment frazzled eardrums and interest.

Musically, the Jeremy Steig Quintet was the most successful and satisfying, but Atkins, backed by a 30-piece orchestra, was impressive as a polished-folksy performer and as a well-rounded musician, commercial or not.

Steig, whose jazz is strongly rock-flavored, brought with him a truly heavyweight group: Jan Hammer on Fender-Rhodes piano, Don Alias on drums, Gene Perla on electric bass and Eddie Gomez on string bass.

Performing in the suitably smaller Tanglewood theatre, Steig's group was late in setting up, but finally counted off its first tune. It relies heavily on distorted and contorted sounds, but there were some discernible bugs in the sound system initially.

* * *

STEIG, on flute and A-flat piccolo, was startling in his attack, fluttering up and down chords, punching out rhythms with dynamics and often singing simultaneously. His ballad solos were almost ethereal, particularly with his pianissimo lines, which faded into breathy harmonic overtones. However, Steig was not impressive at all playing blues. He ran through his book of stock funky phrases sounding more mechanical than flowing.

Several of the Steig tunes began eerily with drummer Alias thrashing about and bassist Gomez skipping and slurring around in the upper harmonic reaches; the effect was almost disturbing, especially when Hammer began coming up with weird emanations from the Fender-Rhodes. The first time this happened, the country and western fans—a noticeably "straight-looking" bunch—looked around, shook their heads and headed for the exits with their children protectively in tow.

Suddenly, amid the cacophony, the throb of Perla's electric bass emerged, Alias dropped some "attention!!" patterns, and the single-chord build stirred listeners to finger-popping. Uptempo, the group swung furiously; Alias churning at his drums like a boiler stoker and Gomez whipping off his incredible cello-like runs while Hammer and Perla kept things together, rich and funky. Alias won some kudos with a thundering drum solo.

* * *

THE REST of the program, held in the Shed, began swingingly with "Cajun" Doug Kershaw—looking like a cross between Ichabod Crane and Rumpelstiltskin — and his six backup musicians kicking off some lickety-split "yahoo" tunes. But, piercing electronic feedback soon sabotaged the performance. The best Kershaw could do was to leap around the stage, mugging and winking archly at the rapidly dissipating audience.

Nothing worked well for him, including his electric violin, electric concertina, and harmonica. He displayed a rich baritone voice, but little depth of material—either that, or his musicians just weren't familiar with his tunes. Too bad, because they seemed pretty competent—two keyboard players, an electric bassist, a drummer, and two electric guitarists. Kershaw finally worked up some enthusiasm in the youthful crowd, with about 30 of them climbing on stage for a riotous ending.

* * *

THE ATKINS segment was packaged slickness, but the sound system generally worked well. Chet, a recording executive in charge of RCA's Nashville studios, displayed relaxed competence as he ran through his bag of country and western, Spanish, classical and pop offerings. He was backed by Henry Strelickus on electric bass, Ferrell Norris on drums and the "Chet Atkins Pickup Philharmonic," an orchestra conducted by RCA staff musician Albert Coleman and comprising musicians from the Berkshire Music Festival, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Local 9 of the American Federation of Musicians of Pittsfield.

Atkins was obliged to do an encore of "music that got me out of Appalachia" after a standing ovation.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 7 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Opens Gates As Concert Sales Drop

LENOX — Most of the 3,449 persons attending last night's Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood were admitted free of charge because advance ticket sales had been unexpectedly low.

Miss Dinah Daniels, a spokesman for the Berkshire Music Festival, this morning said that she did not know what the paid attendance was, but the calls were placed to area summer camps yesterday afternoon to recruit a free audience. Advance ticket sales were reported to have totaled only 400 by midday yesterday.

Miss Daniels explained that preconcert publicity was low-keyed to guard against a possible turnout of the 15,000 to 20,000 persons who showed up at Trends concerts in 1969 and 1970 when rock performers were featured.

The small turnout may also have been a result of the diverse bill of performers—Chet Atkins' country and western and commercial music, Doug Kershaw's cajun Indian music and Jeremy Steig's jazz group—although Miss Daniels declined to comment on this.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood's artistic director, explained in a weekend press release that it is his aim to present a "wide spectrum of ethnic and popular music" rather than to feature a single type of offering at each concert.

Despite the low attendance, Miss Daniels said Tanglewood did not suffer a financial loss on last night's concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
JUL 5 1971
New England Newsclip

Contemporary Trends Concerts

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw and Jeremy Steig head the first of the Contemporary Trends concerts Tuesday night at Tanglewood sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra summer academy.

Steig will appear in the theater-concert hall at 6, Kershaw in the Shed at 7.30 and Atkins in the Shed at 9.

Country-western star Chet Atkins' performing activities have varied from appearances with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops to straight country and western shows.

His compositions have exerted great influence on current rock artists. His sound has influenced many performers, including the Beatles.

On the same program in the Shed is Doug Kershaw and his 6-piece band. Kershaw, who plays the electric violin, is a leading exponent of cajun music, a music native to rural Louisiana.

His band consists of guitar, bass, drum and piano. Kershaw writes most of his own material and claims to have written over 19,000 songs.

The first act on the program is jazz flutist Jeremy Steig and his group. Born in 1942, Steig has made 8 recordings and has worked with such artists as Richie Havens, Tim Hardin and Bill Evans. Steig will appear with his group of drums, electric piano, electric bass and bass.

The 5000-seat Shed, which opens on three sides onto the lawn, offers room for the sound of the larger groups; while the 1200-seat Theatre Concert-Hall offers a smaller, more intimate setting.

Some concerts in the Trend series will begin in the Theatre Concert-Hall and move to the Shed. Ticket holders for a single concert are admitted to all events for that evening.

The Tuesday program begins at 6 p.m. Atkins and Kershaw perform in the Shed and Steig in the Theatre. Tickets for the July 6 concert are $6 and $7 for reserved seats and $5 for general admission.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,6[illegible] SUN 145,160
785
JUN 29 1971

Tanglewood 'Trends' Concerts

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—In a move to avoid programs that would attract the last two years crowds of 20,000-plus, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has announced a change of focus for its "contemporary trends concerts" this summer.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood artistic director, along with Seiji Ozawa, announced Thursday a series of four concerts offering everything from jazz to country and western music, "introducing new forms and trends" in music. The dates are July 6, 13, 20 and Aug. 10.

In addition to the 5,000-seat music shed, a smaller 1,000-seat theater will be used in presenting performances by the various groups each night.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 8 1971
New England Newsclip

Contemporary (?) Trends

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Music is the most personal form of culture our society has. Music serves many valuable purposes: enjoyment, expression of emotions and, perhaps most important, a form of communication through lyrics. Also there are numerous types of music, each one of which is bound to please someone.

This summer Tanglewood is presenting the Contemporary Trends series along with the annual Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Due to local town pressure, and the retirement of Bill Graham (who owned Fillmores West and East and in the past managed the Contemporary Trends concerts at Tanglewood), no one really knew before two weeks ago whether or not there would be the regular Trends concert series.

For financial reasons, Tanglewood had to have "contemporary" concerts because of the popular response. It was also necessary to raise the prices. For political reasons, it was necessary for Tanglewood to take into account local pressures against these concerts. But did Tanglewood take into account the most important thing of all — a commitment to represent actual "contemporary" music?

The Tanglewood administration is obviously aware of the diversified musical tastes. This is evidenced by this year's schedule, including performers in country, jazz and popular music. However, with the exception of one concert, Tanglewood is completely blacklisting current progressive music, which is synonymous with "contemporary" music. Tanglewood is breaking a precedent which began several years ago when folk and rock concerts were initiated in the summer schedules.

This appears to be a mistake. It is fine to have the different styles of music represented. But how can the majority of these styles be listed as "contemporary" when in reality they should be listed under "country," "western," "popular," or whatever the category might be?

It seems that Tanglewood's least consideration is quality and priorities. For "contemporary" concerts, they should obtain musicians who are currently enjoying the most popularity, not obscure or outdated ones. These latter musicians don't deserve to be slighted, however; but they also don't deserve to be classified as "contemporary."

RICHARD COMBES
15 Barker Rd.
Pittsfield

PRESS-HERALD
PORTLAND, MAINE.
D. 54,974
W. 24,000
JUN 25 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Out To Draw Fewer Fans This Season

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — In a move to avoid programs that would attract the last two years' crowds of 20,000-plus, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has announced a change of focus for its "contemporary trends concerts" this summer.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood artistic director, along with Seiji Ozawa, announced Thursday a series of four concerts offering everything from jazz to country and western music, "introducing new forms and trends" in music. The dates are July 6, 13, 0 and Aug. 10.

In addition to the 5,000-seat music shed, a smaller 1,000-seat theater will be used in presenting performances by the various groups each night.

Two years ago The Who, Jefferson Airplane and B.B. King were all packed into one Tanglewood program, drawing a massive audience of 23,000, and strangling the narrow lanes that lead to the festival grounds.

The Berkshire Music Center opens June 28 for 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and abroad who will study during the intensive eight-week summer program.

The Boston Symphony begins its summer concert schedule at Tanglewood July 2, with Ozawa conducting Bach.

Tanglewood is a 210-acre estate given to the Boston Symphony in the 30s and was once the home of author Nathaniel Hawthorne.

FREE PRESS
BURLINGTON, VT.
D. 46,000

JUN 25 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Changes Concert Format

LENOX, Mass. (AP) —In a move to avoid programs that would attract the last two years' crowds of 20,000-plus, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood has announced a change of focus for its "contemporary trends concerts" this summer.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood artistic director, along with Seiji Ozawa, announced Thursday a series of four concerts offering everything from jazz to country and western music, "introducing new forms and trends" in music. The dates are July 6, 13, 20 and Aug. 10.

In addition to the 5,000 seat music shed, a smaller 1,000 seat theater will be used in presenting performances by the various groups each night.

Two years ago The Who, Jefferson Airplane and B. B. King were all packed into one Tanglewood program, drawing a massive audience of 23,000, and strangling the narrow lanes that lead to the festival grounds.

The Berkshire Music Center opens June 28 for 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and abroad who will study during the intensive eight-week summer program.

The Boston Symphony begins its summer concert schedule at Tanglewood July 2, with Ozawa conducting Bach.

Tanglewood is a 210 acre estate given to the Boston Symphony in the 30's and was once the home of author Nathaniel Hawthorne.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUN 26 1971 New England Newsclip

Changes for Tanglewood

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS
Springfield, Mass., Saturday, June 26, 1971 + 9

LENOX — (AP) — In a move to avoid programs that would attract the last two years' crowds of 20,000-plus, the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood has announced a change of focus for its "contemporary trends concerts" this summer.

Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood artistic director, along with Seiji Ozawa, announced a series of four concerts offering everything from jazz to country and western music, "introducing new forms and trends" in music. The dates are July 6, 13, 20 and Aug. 10.

The programs, subject to change, will present:

July 6, Chet Atkins and Doug Kershaw in the shed and Jeremy Steig in the theater-concert hall.

July 13, Jose Feliciano and Marion Williams in the shed and the Paul Winter Consort in the theater-concert hall.

July 20, Blood, Sweat and Tears and Symphonic Metamorphosis in the shed and Roy Ayers in the theater-concert hall.

Aug. 10, P.D.Q. Bach with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Joseph Silverstein in the shed.

Two years ago The Who, Jefferson Airplane and B.B. King were all packed into one Tanglewood program, drawing a massive audience of 23,000, and strangling the narrow lanes that lead to the festival grounds.

The Berkshire Music Center opens tomorrow for 425 young musicians from all parts of the United States and abroad who will study during the intensive eight-week summer program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its summer concert schedule at Tanglewood July 2, with Ozawa conducting Bach.

Tanglewood is a 210-acre estate given to the Boston Symphony in the 30's and was once the home of author Nathaniel Hawthorne.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 15 1971 New England Newsclip

Rock Fans Happy At Lenox Concert

Bus Sun.

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — Eclectic, electric, wet and wild. Tanglewood's contemporary trends concert Tuesday, headlined by Sly and the Family Stone, was a sell-out suceess.

Good Combination

The big rock-love concert festivals around the nation have lately been more rocky than loving but the beauty and order of the setting at Tanglewood still holds a framework for perfect people fests. Here in Lenox the combination of good rock and masses of people, straight and freak, still works.

Sly, an imp with the face of a voluptuous angel and the voice of a raunchy urchin, held an audience of 14,000 high and happy for over an hour. He built to a shattering, visceral final set with his best seller, "Higher, Higher." The audience echoing and topping him as he took them higher and higher.

The audience started out suspicious because Sly and his family have gotten a bad reputation for not showing up at the last few dates and this audience was in no mood to be defrauded. They pushed, whistled and shouted during the long stage wait until the mikes and amps were ready for the star to appear. Once Sly was spotlit center stage, he wooed and won them easily.

Driven Into Shed

His records are good and more precise and perfect than a concert, but nothing can compare with the excitement of him performing live. The group's brass work is better handled and more subtle than Chicago, their musicianship is almost as fine as Santana and Sly himself combines a bit of Little Richard with the pout of Mick Jagger and a good sized talent of his own.

The rain drove the lawn listeners into the shed. It was carpeted with people, four deep in the aisles, hanging from pillars, struts and rafters. No one could move, but with such a performance, who wanted to?

Marion Williams, a Gospel shouter with a rich contralto range and an earth shaking strut, warmed up the house. Her back-up group, the Hummingbirds, rolled some old favorites including "Didn't It Rain" in a skat rock barbershop style. Miss Williams belted out "Happy Days" like she meant it and sang "God, Please Bless America Again" twice. She ran into a bad audience vibration as they wanted the Family Stone and Sly.

With Bill Graham retired from the rock impressario scene, Tanglewood is going it alone this year. It is more informal with less elaborate gimmicks: there are no programs, no huge TV screens and cameras, no banks of lights.

The audience listens to the first part of the program in the smaller concert hall and then meanders for picnics and wine until 7.45 and the big shed concert.

The opener for this soul satisfying evening was a very musicianly group, the Paul Winter Consort, which played rock with flavorings from Latin America, Bach, moog and raga. They sent their intricate sound over the people - littered lawns, a hybrid of bongo, mariachi, lute and templebells.

Full moon Aug. 6
Day of year 1971
ge 21 The Eagle July 14, 1971

Youths Pack Concert at Tanglewood

LENOX — Although there were conflicting reports this morning on the total attendance last night at the Contemporary Trends concert, estimates by Tanglewood officials ranged from 13,500 to 17,000, including 12,849 ticketholders.

Despite the throngs of youths, attracted primarily by rock group Sly and the Family Stone, a high level of order was maintained, officials said, even during the 80-minute delay between gospel singer Marion Williams' performance and Sly's appearance.

The attendance situation last night was in considerable contrast to last week's Trends concert. Only approximately 3,000 persons had turned up for a low-key program featuring the groups of Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw and Jeremy Steig, and most of the crowd was recruited from area camps and was admitted free of charge. Last night's offering, headlined by highly popular rock star Sly Stone, required no recruited listeners.

Miss Dinah Daniels, press spokesman, said the 25 police and Pinkerton personnel worked mainly to maintain order rather than to stringently enforce drug and liquor laws. Alcoholic beverage drinking by minors and marijuana smoking by spectators in general were widespread and overt.

Tanglewood officials were generally pleased with the turnout and the reception given to the performers, Miss Daniels said. Artistic director Gunther Schuller earlier said each Trends concert is an attempt to expose audiences to a variety of music. Many of the young rock fans who came to hear Sly clapped in time to Miss Williams' songs and applauded enthusiastically at the Paul Winter jazz performance.

Promotion of the Trends programs that feature popular rock groups will not be as strong as last year, Miss Daniels said. This is to keep crowds at a more manageable size, she explained.

134

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Concert Audience

Joel Librizzi

Audience fashions at the Contemporary Trends concerts at Tanglewood shock some, but not those who recall the hot, historic night 30-odd years ago when Serge Koussevitzky shed his coat and bade the orchestra to do likewise.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 17 1971 New England Newsclip

Mailbox

Wrong People Branded 'Pigs'

While listening to "Sly and the Family Stone" at Tanglewood, I heard the word "pig" muttered almost every time a policeman walked by. The "now" generation of peace children and hippies were there on the lawn in droves and most had beer, wine or drugs with them. This is fine, after all they were just doing their own thing.

However, when the concert was over, the lawn was a disgusting mass of debris. There were beer cans, wine bottles, cigarette wrappers, etc., it was sickening! But how could it be? These are the advocates of peace, love and ecology that are going to change the world.

Well folks, it wasn't 5,000 or more cops that left Tanglewood looking like Bondi's Island, it was 5,000 hippies.

Either the word hippie is a synonym for pig or else it's an abbreviation of hypocrite. We can only hope that when they change the world, they do not leave it like they left Tanglewood.

J. C. D.

Westfield.

Affronted

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Tuesday night's Contemporary Trends concert proved the epitome of poor organization and poor showmanship. It was an affront to the sizable audience.

An anxious throng had waited with an admirable amount of patience in spite of tedious delays, inclement weather and unreasonable admission prices.

One must contemplate with some sadness the thought that our renowned Tanglewood could exhibit such blatant lack of respect for the audience, without which it could not survive.

MARTHA RYAN

48 Church St.
Lenox

Slighted by Sly at Tanglewood

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Upon reading in The Eagle that Sly and the Family Stone were to play at Tanglewood, I immediately planned to attend. It was a beautiful day and we arrived at the grounds of Tanglewood at 2:30 and bought our lawn tickets. We were informed that the gates would not open until 5. That was all right because there were a couple hundred people there already. At 5, the gates were opened and streams of people entered and found their way to their seats or found places on the lawn for the program scheduled to start at 6.

During the evening, it rained on and off, and at 9 Sly wasn't even there yet. He finally came on at 10, but by the time he started to play, it was after 10. At 11, Sly ended the concert. The act everyone wanted to see, and waited patiently for in the rain, lasted only one hour. With the crowd yelling for more, someone on the stage took over the PA system to say: "Sly worked hard for you tonight. He's tired." This was supposed to explain to all the wet people that paid at least $5 why they had only one measly hour of music.

Bill Graham closed the Fillmores because of commercialism. The fans weren't getting what they paid for or what they deserved to see. Everybody was worried about making money, not the quality or quantity of entertainment. It seems that this same commercialism will keep Tanglewood open, at the expense of the fans.

GARY RICCI

25 Ashley St.
Pittsfield

EAGLE JULY 15, 1971

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 14 1971

New England Newsclip

Whitestone

YOUTHFUL CROWD of roughly 14,000 covered much of Tanglewood's lawn last night for gospel, jazz and rock performances. Lawn was just as blanketed this morning by wastepaper, bottles, cans and personal items left behind. Intermittent rain drove many inside or away, but a hardy few stayed for a soaking.

Youths Pack Concert at Tanglewood

LENOX — Although there were conflicting reports this morning on the total attendance last night at the Contemporary Trends concert, estimates by Tanglewood officials ranged from 13,500 to 17,000, including 12,849 ticketholders.

Despite the throngs of youths, attracted primarily by rock group Sly and the Family Stone, a high level of order was maintained, officials said, even during the 80-minute delay between gospel singer Marion Williams' performance and Sly's appearance.

The attendance situation last night was in considerable contrast to last week's Trends concert. Only approximately 3,000 persons had turned up for a low-key program featuring the groups of Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw and Jeremy Steig, and most of the crowd was recruited from area camps and was admitted free of charge. Last night's offering, headlined by highly popular rock star Sly Stone, required no recruited listeners.

Miss Dinah Daniels, press spokesman, said the 25 police and Pinkerton personnel worked mainly to maintain order rather than to stringently enforce drug and liquor laws. Alcoholic beverage drinking by minors and marijuana smoking by spectators in general were widespread and overt.

Tanglewood officials were generally pleased with the turnout and the reception given to the performers, Miss Daniels said. Artistic director Gunther Schuller earlier said each Trends concert is an attempt to expose audiences to a variety of music. Many of the young rock fans who came to hear Sly clapped in time to Miss Williams' songs and applauded enthusiastically at the Paul Winter jazz performance.

Promotion of the Trends programs that feature popular rock groups will not be as strong as last year, Miss Daniels said. This is to keep crowds at a more manageable size, she explained.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 16 1971

Sly and 12,850 at Tanglewood

A funny thing happened at Tanglewood Tuesday night. Sly and the Family Stone showed for their scheduled appearance.

Sly, who was preceded by the jazz sounds of the Paul Winter Consort, and gospel singer Marion Williams, drew an estimated 12,850 fans, despite his reputation for scheduled non-appearances.

And they were more than ready for him. They cheered any black face that appeared on stage during the hour long equipment preparations. Too bad the performanceonly ran about the same length.

THE FANS' ENTHUSIASM often precluded attempts to hear the music well, but Sly's forte is the feeling he creas; the "Dance To the Music" spirit, or his famous singpalong style version of "I Want To Take Pou Higher," the "boom-booms", and the "boo-lacka-lacka-lackas". But even as people stood and danced on their chairs, the spirit of both performers and crowd wasn't quite together Tuesday night.

Each of the respective Family Stone members seemed to play at least as well as on their recordings. There were even some unexpected improvisations, like Sly's organ solos on the opening "Thank You Falettinme Be Mice Elf Agin". And there's something amazing about that Cynthia lady playing trumpet as she does.

SLY STONE

BUT TLECTRIC MUSIC requires more than hooked up instruments. Take most any cut from a live performance album, and compare it with the original recording. Generally the pace is faster, sparked by an enthusiastic exchange between performer and audience. But Sly slowed the pace of almost every number Tuesday night. In "Stand!" the slower tempo was welcome, giving emphasis to the words of freedom. But overall the tempo changes merely cut into the itality of the feeling.

Something was missing. Maybe fans would have wanted more if they'd heard six hours; maybe they expect too much of a performer who consistently fails to show and still draws large audiences. Or perhaps they expect too little. Should Sly attempt some heavy improvisations or new numbers for audiences that seem to respond best to songs made popular two or three years ago?

HE SHOWED, he performed, but it wasn't the same moving mass of fringe and body who took Woodstock live and film audiences higher yet. The Tanglewood audience needed no "Say Higher and throw the peace sign up" rap. Nor did they need anyone to tell them that the number as they knew it was left unfinished.

It was only a few minutes before the hands of peace were raised in an expression far less loving as the performers failed to respond to the unfriendly demands of "MORT!" "I guess we're lucky he showed up at all," mused one young man.

Yeah, I guess. (Donna George)

136

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 13 1971 New England Newsclip

the lively world

by MILTON R. BASS

THE KEY WORDS at Tanglewood right now are "artistic integrity." They are being used mostly to try to explain why so few people were willing to buy tickets for last week's Contemporary Trends concert starring country-western ace Chet Atkins. No one is saying how many tickets were actually sold, but a fair swimmer could stay under water while you counted up to the number.

Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood, made the prime decisions in picking the musicians for this year's series, since Bill Graham, who handled the booking for the past two years, has quietly folded his Fillmores and is contemplating his money by sun-speckled waters. In an interview this week, Mr. Schuller said that his primary goal was to cover the broad spectrum of contemporary music, concentrating on artistic value rather than gate potential. Chet Atkins is a superb musician who played beautifully at his concert here, said Mr. Schuller, and this justified his being booked even though the paid attendance was for all purposes nonexistent.

* * *

TANGLEWOOD has always maintained that it started the Contemporary Trends concerts because it wants a closer contact with the music of the day rather than with the fact that the Saratoga Performing Arts Center was booking some 31 concerts by popular music stars. Be that as it may, Tanglewood has been consistent in its handling of the concerts as an adjunct to its primary purposes—24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Berkshire Music Center for the advancement of music training in this country. Tanglewood has a unique spot in the musical heart of the entire world, and it has not lost sight of this despite pressures from a yearly deficit and tourist promoters in Berkshire County. It is impossible to be all things to all men, and Tanglewood gravely weighs its choices and responsibilities.

* * *

IF THERE IS a man who knows about all things and all men in the field of music, it is Gunther Schuller, who is a virtuoso performer on the horn, a composer, an authority on jazz, president of the New England

Gunther Schuller

Conservatory of Music and artistic director of Tanglewood. He has always been a man who promoted the new directions in music, one who was vitally concerned that young composers and artists received an opportunity to display their wares if not their genius. He is also stubborn and aggressive, which also helps in achieving things in this world.

"In this day of instant communication," says Schuller, "it is impossible to ignore new developments. If the young musicians in Osaka open up the sound spectrum in some direction, all the young musicians of the world know about it within a few days. Therefore, the pressure on these people is more intense than ever before."

* * *

SCHULLER IS aware that most of the young people would prefer the Contemporary Trends to feature mostly rock stars, but he is determined that the Tanglewood concerts will cover the whole spectrum of what is current. There will be some rock musicians, he says, but they will reflect the "softness" that has permeated the field in the past year through the influence of James Taylor and others of his school.

"Rock was more of a sociological, quasi-political manifestation than a musical development," says Schuller. "Nothing happened musically from the primitive intensification of what we used to call 'rhythm and blues.' "

* * *

THIS THEN is the reasoning behind the bookings at Tanglewood this year. Schuller is more interested in showing what is happening musically in this country than in drawing thousands of screaming young fans within the fences. He will be the first to admit that it would be nice to have the best of both possible worlds—music and gate—but he will be the last to abandon his position.

Tonight we have Sly and the Family Stone. How many paid admissions do you think they will draw? That's exactly what I figure, too. Read this page tomorrow to see if we were right.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 14 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Review

The hordes return at Tanglewood

By JOHN SCHWEIZER

THE HORDES returned to Tanglewood last night. Approximately 14,000 persons — mostly teeny-boppers, it seemed — turned out for the second Contemporary Trends program.

The program got under way with the seven-piece Paul Winter Consort performing in the theatre. Winter's is a fairly exotic group, in both its makeup and its selection of tunes. It was heavy on Latin and African rhythms — at least a variety of percussion instruments was used. The tunes were adaptations of melodies from around the world; Winter himself seemed particularly fond of Bartok-like orchestrations.

* * *

THE ORIENTAL cast given the group by Winter's soprano saxophone and Paul McCandles' English horn and oboe meshed well with the energetic rhythms created by David Johnson on conga drums and Warren Smith on traps and field drums. Acoustic bassist Glenn Moore also contributed well-miked throbs and pulses.

Winter's primary horn, alto saxophone, was put to good use on one piece in particular — a three-part invention reminiscent of Bach. His alto sound is similar to Paul Desmond's, but his lines are more lilting.

A spectacularly strong, forceful display of cello playing was exhibited throughout by David Darling, especially on one ballad solo where he accompanied himself with haunting vocal shrieks and cries.

Whitestone

Sly and his group rocking their souls to an estimated crowd of 14,000 at Tanglewood.

Although the rhythms were the predominating aspect of the performance, the percussive patterns seemed excessively metronomic, almost stilted — it just didn't swing. Of course, swinging is not Winter's heaviest bag, but this hardly diminishes the validity of his music as jazz. The Winter performance was very substantial.

* * *

PRESENTING the Contemporary Trends jazz offerings in the small theatre rather than in the Shed where noisy rock enthusiasts run about is a wise move. Theatregoers can come and go as they please without disrupting the relative intimacy of performances.

Marion Williams, "the gospel soul queen," performed in the Shed amid increasing noise as the youngsters grew impatient waiting for headliner Sly Stone and his group. Miss Williams covered most of the gospel spectrum, including very churchy hymns with piano accompaniment, bluesy shouts and rock-flavored riffs. A male quartet backed her on many tunes, and a guitar and a tambourine were also heard.

THE CROWD picked up on some of Miss Williams' up-tempo numbers; hand-clapping began as enthusiasm rose. Miss Williams, like many gospel shouters, sometimes sang slightly sharp on fortissimo sections, but this sometimes serves to brighten the sound. Jazz and the blues and, indeed, much of Sly Stone's music, is rooted in gospel singing. This probably would have been more obvious if Sly had not been delayed 80 minutes. As it was, thundershowers sent much of the crowd home; the same storm resulted in Sly's having to charter a helicopter from New York City after regular flights were canceled. He landed across the street at Avaloch. Despite the delay, the kids had not lost their enthusiasm.

* * *

SLY'S BAND, which includes brass and reed instruments, combines rock and soul more effectively (and successfully) than most groups. Sly's trademark — syncopated punching by the horns — was supported by strong, incessant drumming. Although Sly is quite highly regarded by other musicians, the repetitiveness of the call-and-response of his singing and brass punctuations grew wearisome particularly with the overriding drumming. At times, the flow was very herky-jerky.

The crowd didn't care though. It was a cheering stomping group that stood on its chairs calling for more for at least 10 minutes after Sly concluded his 50-minute performance.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 18 1971 New England Newsclip

Ray Charles Is Featured At Contemporary Concert

The third of Tanglewood's 1971 series of Contemporary Trends Concerts takes place Tuesday evening, July 20. Headlining the evening is soul singer and pianist Ray Charles who performs at 9 p.m. in The Shed in Lenox.

An accomplished musician, Ray Charles taught himself to play and write for every brass and wind instrument in an orchestra. He specializes in piano, organ and sax. He composes and arranges. But such virtuosity in itself is not sufficient to account for his legend. The genius of Ray Charles is his baring of his person, of his soul, with its wounds and scars, to his audience.

Also featured on the program will be talented vibist, singer, composer Roy Ayers. Through practice and experimentation, Ayers has mastered the vibes and the unique incorporation of the fizz-tone through the attachment of a device which is normally used on guitars.

In 1966, he joined the Herbie Mann Quintet and stayed with the group for three years as Mann's feature artist. In 1967, he was voted top new star on vibes in Down Beat International, and in 1969 was chosen as number five vibist in their Established Talent Category. Ayers performs at 6 p.m. in Tanglewood's Theatre Concert Hall.

Also appearing will be Symphonic Metamorphosis (7:30 p.m.—Shed). Symphonic Metamorphosis approaches rock from a unique angle: that of the classically trained musician. All the members hold degrees in music and are members of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. Rock, for them is a dynamic means in which the modern musician can express his innermost creativity.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 20 1971 New England Newsclip

RAY CHARLES

At Tanglewood

B Sym.

The third of Tanglewood's 1971 Contemporary Trends concerts is scheduled tonight, with soul singer and pianist Ray Charles perform ing at 9. p.m. in The Shed. Also on the program in Lenox is vibist, singer and composer Roy Ayers.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Ray Charles' Rock, Big Band Mix Still Works

B Sym.

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — Ray Charles is still a star performer. From his spotlit entrance at the Tuesday night contemporary trends concert at Tanglewood to his hand clapping finale he entertained the people. His silken mixture of 1970s rock and 1930s big band sound still works.

Said Improving

The audience of about 5000 was a cross-section of America with every color and type represented and an age spread from babes in arms, lots of kids, fans in their 40s and a good sized contingent of distinguished grandparents. Curiosity and memory crossed the generation gap and for this concert the usual wall-to-wall teeny-boppers were in a minority.

Charles with his voice and smile improving with the years, did his classic yesterdays and a bouncy, sexy feels good to me. He did some high skat work with a guitar echo that was stunning. The audience happily cheered and applauded its old favorites. He saved the evening from the blahs and handled a few hecklers with wit and smooth professional put downs.

His back-up band is a drilled and organized precision team. To see 17 suited musicians nowadays is a shock after all those tie-dyes and T shirts. They have a hard, brassy and blaring sound, their only concession to today's tastes was one electric guitar and one electric bass added to the standard Dorsey-Miller glittering bandstands and all that massed brass. His singing girl quartette, the Rayettes, sang and oonmoobla — dee'd well even though three of them had on neck braces as a result of an accident in Detroit last week.

Other Groups

Charles was preceded by two groups, one interesting but somewhat styleless and the other one hectic and quite unimpressive. Metamorphosis is a seven man group of excellent musicians in search of a style. They have had symphonic training as well as a rock background and can play almost anything, on any instrument and in any arrangement. They offered "Love Train" and "Liberated Woman" in a hard rock, Blood, Sweat and Tears style, "Eleanor Rigby," the Beatles classic, as a beautifully played flute and brass modern chamber music piece and some pure Debussy.

Roy Ayers Ubiquity is a younger and less cohesive fivesome. They sounded better when they stayed close to the jazz sound of a John Coltrane than when they battered their way into nonstop rock. They really soundblasted some of the older ladies who had come to swing with Ray Charles.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 22 1971 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 21 1971 New England Newsclip

Music Review

Ray Charles Heads Powerhouse Performance

By JOHN SCHWEIZER

THE MOST musically satisfying of the Contemporary Trends programs at Tanglewood drew a modest crowd of 4,059 last night.

The jazz group of Roy Ayres, and Ray Charles and the Metamorphosis rock combo ran through a variety of tunes despite occasional hoots and catcalls from a large contingent of obnoxious high school teeny boppers.

The heavyweight performer was, of course, Ray Charles, who came on to a standing ovation, played about 45 minutes, and left 'em standing and shouting for more. The 17-piece big band accompanying Charles is a loose, hard-swinging group strongly suggestive of the Basie band minus some precision. Indeed, trombonist Henry Coker and trumpet soloist Blue Mitchell are Basie alumni. Mitchell took some finely executed solos — clean, with sometimes-jabbing, sometimes-sustained high note phrases.

The Charles rhythm section was a bit murky, particularly the electric bass, but guitarist Fred Martin did lay on some funky, funky lines. The other principal soloist was David "Fathead" Newman, a tenor saxophonist right out of that blowzy "Texas" school of playing. Newman managed to stretch out at least twice with crisp, "bootin'" runs.

After a series of jazz tunes by the band alone, Ray made his entrance and immediately proceeded to show just where singers Tom Jones, Joe Cocker and others got their stuff. Few singers today can use their voices as Ray did last night — just like an instrument, and with feeling. On ballads, especially "I Can't Stop Loving You" and "Yesterday," Ray's rough-but-gentle singing coupled with his soulful piano lines proved the tremendous emotional substance of true jazz singing.

Whitestone

Heavyweight performer at Tanglewood, Ray Charles

The popular Raelettes were somewhat less hardworking than usual; three of the four singers were in neck braces because of a recent automobile accident. But, that old city Baptist church harmonizing was there to support Ray; you don't lose that feeling in an auto accident.

* * *

THE FIVE-PIECE Roy Ayres Ubiquity is ostensibly a jazz combo, but its heavy reliance on Afro-Cuban rhythms lends almost a rockish air to its sound. Melodically, there was not too much happening; Ayres was a technical wizard on the vibraphone and succeeded in sustaining long rhythmic buildups with blinding speed — mostly up and down and up and down the chords. His heavily reverbed vocals weren't too telling, laden with such clichés as "if you can dig it," "do your thing" and "git it together."

Drummer David Lee swung like an iron man with his left hand "chop-chop-chop" quarter-notes, and conga drummer Imtume provided the strong, rhythmic undercurrent. Harry Whitaker produced some strange electronic sounds on Fender-Rhodes piano, but his solos sounded vaguely like those of rock guitarist Carlos Santana unfortunately. The group built shrieking excitement over the barely discernable pulse of the electric bass of Leon Pendarvis. Ayres was very effective on various rhythm instruments — gourd, tambourine, cowbell, etc. Ubiquity was fun to listen to.

* * *

METAMORPHOSIS is a seven-piece rock band comprised of members of the Detroit Symphony. Its performance included several classical-like selections, including two works by Claude Debussy. Sounding very much like Chicago and a couple of other big rock bands that make up in arrangements and execution what they lack in feeling (at least they don't seem to evoke much feeling), Metamorphosis produced that powerhouse sound.

The intervals of classical ensemble music, featuring bassoon, French horn, flute and trumpet, were interesting, but seemed more of a display of musical versatility than constructive contrasts. A flute solo by guitarist Irv Monroe was rudely interrupted by some infantile high schoolers.

On the rock numbers, Monroe sang some rather sterile-sounding blues, but handled his guitar well. The rock ensemble of Tom Bacon on organ, Don Haas on trumpet, David Krehbiel on horn and Larry Ragland on tenor saxophone was often scorching, never missing or fouling a line. Drummer Sam Tundo was, at times, fireless, but he did the job, as did electric bassist Wes Jacobs.

Judging from its performance last night, Metamorphosis ought to be doing as well as Chicago et al., but then again, maybe there's just not enough room at the top.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 3 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Cancels PDQ Bach

PDQ Bach, the final concert in the Contemporary Trends program at Tanglewood, planned for Aug. 10, has been canceled because of "scheduling difficulties," according to Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony.

Perry said today that complications outweighed the advantages in arranging for Peter Schickele, originator of PDQ Bach, to fly in from California for the concert that was planned for next Tuesday night in the Shed.

The Tanglewood management has not been encouraged by the attendance record of the other three Trends concerts this summer. Sly and the Family Stone, which appeared July 13, attracted the largest gathering of 14,000 persons. Country western star Chet Atkins performed for a sparse audience of 3,449 and the Ray Charles concert was equally discouraging with only 4,059 in attendance.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 31 1971 New England Newsclip

When music lays an egg

Differences in drumming

By John A. Schweizer

LENOX

ONLY ONE of the two major dispensaries of non-classical, contemporary concert music in the Berkshires is experiencing any degeee of success in its presentations this year. The reason is not hard to see.

The two music spots are Tanglewood, with its "Contemporary Trends" series, and the Lenox Arts Center/Music Inn. It's the Arts Center that is succeeding, while Tanglewood is laying an egg. Why?

Comments by the impresarios at both places seem to indicate that it is a question of drumming that is responsible for the differences in success.

At Tanglewood, Artistic Director Gunther Schuller's prime concern for artistic quality in booking contemporary performers seems to be offset by prevailing attitudes inherent in the BSO organization. That is, advertising of Trends concerts is geared to "filling the house" in an effort to cover the costs of other Berkshire Music Festival activities. Schuller says his schedule is so full he could not possibly involve himself in the promotion of Trends programs, although he might want to.

In contrast, Arts Center owner David Rothstein, producer Manny Greenhill and concert manager Bernard Gelb all share a similar philosophy, that is, in Rothstein's words, "to present good music in the best possible surroundings . . . and to break even.

"We're chartered as a non-profit organization . . . we're not looking for a big bash."

* * *

SCHULLER'S ideas are no less exalting. "I want to present something akin to the total spectrum of music today, with good groups. Artistic quality is my first priority — I can justify the artistic merits of every performer we've had. I'm not responsible for filling the house, so I don't select groups with that uppermost in mind, although I can see the need of getting at least one 'name' performer on each bill — we have to draw enough to pay expenses."

But for two of the Trends concerts, it was necessary to massively paper the house to give the performers an audience of sufficient counter-decibel response to warm up their amplifiers. The third concert drew 15,000 — three times the attendance of the other two — but the crowd consisted of rude, noisy and unappreciative teen-agers and sub-teens.

The Arts Center, on the other hand, has drawn an average of 2,200 for three of its four concerts. The fourth, featuring Ravi Shankar, attracted only 1,000 because of threatening weather. These figures don't sound impressive, except that 5,000 is the center's comfortable capacity, and Rothstein early this summer said he wasn't looking for more than 2,500 to 3,000 persons per concert. Tonight's scheduled appearance by the Byrds rock group could easily attract up to 10,000 people — most of them teeny boppers — but probably less than half that will show up, and this is by design.

"We don't want the crush of packing the house," says Rothstein. "We don't want a spectacle. There'd be too many problems."

Arts Center audiences have generally been manageable and receptive to performances. The Center has attracted its share of teeny-boppers, but most ticket-holders are there to dig the music, rather than just to be where there is music, to be "part of the scene."

* * *

HOW DO the Arts Center's advertising tactics differ from those of Tanglewood's, and why does it get a better audience? The Arts Center utilizes the printed media—mostly area and Boston and New York City newspapers—and "good music" radio stations to promote its concerts. By contrast, Tanglewood relies primarily on "top 40 radio"; that is, youth-oriented rock stations for promotional spots. It's as simple as that.

The thrust of Trends promotions is at the kids, many of whom keep their ears glued to high-pressure rock stations and who are not (newspaper) reading types. So, what happens when Schuller books his usual three-group concert, including one "name" group? Thousands of kids show up to hear the rock group, and only the rock group, and the other performers are hooted off the stage.

And what happens when the "name" performer is not a rock musician? Hardly anything, as evidenced by the Chet Atkins concert. All the promotional hype was aired via the rock stations, where country & western Chet means nothing to the kids. Meanwhile, the thousands of country & western music fans who listen to such stations as WOKO (Albany) heard no promotion at all.

* * *

IN VIEW of the problems experienced this year, Schuller is understandably less-than-optimistic about next season.

"Sometimes, especially with this lack of appreciation (by audiences), I just feel like getting out of it altogether," he says grimly. "We had to fight to keep the series this year. I know many of the trustees want to stop it. I expect a lot of pressure from them, even though (Seiji) Ozawa and (Leonard) Bernstein are anxious to retain the concerts."

Asked what changes he would make, Schuller says, "I'd like to try more jazz, I think, and a little less rock. Maybe have more in the Theatre (as opposed to the larger Shed). Some established jazz groups . . . some new ones too, of course. Possibly a big band."

Schuller's musical reputation is firmly entrenched regardless of the ups and downs of the Contemporary Trends programs, but it is a little different for Rothstein, Greenhill and Gelb at the less-established Arts Center.

As Gelb explains it: "We've had very few complaints from the town and our neighbors this year. This is good—we want to stay here. I've been promoting concerts for five years; there are reputations and integrity involved . . . I don't want to lose them here."

Probably the major factor affecting the future of contemporary pop here and elsewhere is the degree of audience involvement with the performances. Are people going to be content with being merely an audience, or must they become part of the performance, such as at the Rolling Stones' fiasco at Altamont or the recent aborted Newport Jazz Festival? Or are audiences going to start doing crazy things, like demanding a full and entertaining program in return for their money?

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Trend concerts in perspective

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

John Schweizer's July 31 column titled "Differences in drumming" presents a peculiar picture of Tanglewood's "Contemporary Trends" series and the man so closely identified with it, Gunther Schuller.

As anyone knows who has worked with him, Gunther Schuller is not one lightly to discard the opportunity to assume responsibility. To give the impression that he is uninterested in Trends ticket sales and uninvolved in promotion is to do injustice to his involvement with a series for which all artists are personally chosen or approved by him, both those whose names sell tickets as well as those whose selection is manifestly governed by non-box-office considerations.

None of the Trends artists selected by Gunther Schuller were "hooted off the stage." Presumably the reference was to Marion Williams, who gallantly extended her performance during the Sly cliff-hanger, as we all wondered whether Sly's helicopter would arrive through the rain. The audience was restless and impatient, yes; but if you present Sly, you expect Sly's audience. Audience etiquette isn't related to artistic quality, the Schuller / Trends criterion.

There are other curious items in the article. While Gunther Schuller's schedule is indeed uniquely full, his Berkshire Music Center office was hardly uninvolved with Trends promotion. It was handled this year not as usual by the BSO's press office, but in fact by a capable young man hired for this purpose and directly responsible to Trends headquarters.

Factually, the article errs in stating that rock radio was the sole medium of Trends advertising, as a glance through past issues of The Eagle and other Tanglewood-area papers would reveal. In naming WOKO as a country-western station ignored in promoting Chet Atkins, the facts are wrong again. Both WOKO in Albany and the country-western station in Hartford were utilized, and the Sly and Ray Charles advertising campaigns were similarly tailored to reach their particular audiences.

The fact is simply that there is no amorphous body called an audience, to be lured into a concert hall by an occult process called promotion — or "drumming," if you will.

There are, in fact, many audiences just as there are, to use a favorite word of Schuller's, many "musics." The selection of artists is the prime factor in drawing an audience; then you let people know what's happening and they come or not. Of course, it helps to choose artists whose special audiences are large or live nearby. When box office is the criterion, that's essential; clearly it wasn't done that way at Tanglewood this summer.

If it is necessary in the future to paper the house again in order to attract a sufficiently large audience for the artists selected for the Trends series — if there is a Trends series — that is a problem the management will have to face as it occurs. In the meantime, talk about "drumming" being responsible for the series "laying an egg" seems a little irresponsible in reference to concerts so carefully assembled with serious artistic purpose uppermost in mind.

MARVIN Y. SCHOFER
Public Information Director
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Tanglewood
Lenox

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 22 1971
New England Newsclip

the lively world

by MILTON R. BASS

SEATED in Box No. 4 at Tanglewood next Tuesday night will be Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, to whom this year's Tanglewood-on-Parade is being dedicated. One of the reasons why Mrs. Koussevitzky is being honored is that she can be found seated in Box No. 4 at every Tanglewood concert, and with her can be found two or three or four young musicians or composers who are being helped by the widow of the founder of the Berkshire Music Center.

The late conductor started the BMC in 1940 and nurtured it carefully until his death in 1951. Mrs. Koussevitzky has carried on his work with young musicians, especially with the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, and that is why they are honoring her at the annual "Parade."

* * *

IN ADDITION to her work with the Friends, Mrs. Koussevitzky is president of the Koussevitzky Foundation, the American International Music Fund and the Musicians Club of New York, all of which are concerned in helping talented young people make their mark in music.

Music is as much a part of her life as the 16 breaths she takes each minute, and nearly all of her waking hours are spent in some phase of the medium. When she comes to her home, Seranak, overlooking Stockbridge Bowl, each summer, she immediately takes up where she left off in sorting her husband's archives for the Library of Congress and the Boston Public Library.

* * *

THE LIBRARY of Congress also will get some hundred sketches of the leading musical figures of the last 30 years done by none other than Olga Koussevitzky, who is "very humble" about her talent and does them "just for fun."

As you can see from the above interpretation of BSO associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, the sketches are more than "just for fun." They are never drawn from life, but always in retrospect, when Madame Olga has mused on the artist, the music he was associated with that evening and her own feelings about his personality.

* * *

SHE FIRST started doing these sketches in 1917 when she was staying in her family's villa in the Crimea, near Yalta. A group of young people inaugurated their own community magazine, and she made little sketches of her collaborators as her contribution.

Whitestone

Michael Tilson Thomas

The work proved so personally rewarding (the plaudits of others helped a bit, too) that she continued the sketching over the years. Production was cut down during the '60s when her eyesight weakened, and now the sketches are turned out only occasionally. But there is still great enjoyment in the very doing, and once in a while a new musical personality so catches her attention that he must be delineated in a sketch.

ALTHOUGH SHE is frail and delicate appearing, there is a tenacity to Mrs. Koussevitzky that has enabled her to withstand revolutions, whether they be the people kind or musical. "This is a difficult time for the whole world today and not just the symphony orchestras in them," she said. "There is barbarity in general and it takes a great effort to keep the cultural life alive and not let world conditions inhibit the growth of art."

Which is why she works so hard for organizations like the Friends of Tanglewood. And which is why they are honoring her next Tuesday night.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 130,857
JUL 21 1971
New England Newsclip

Honor

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679
JUL 16 1971
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE

Tanglewood To Hail Widow Of Conductor

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, to be conducted on July 27, will honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long-time dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . ."Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
JUL 26 1971
New England Newsclip

Whitestone Photo

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky

. . . is to be honored at the Berkshire Festival's annual Tanglewood-on-Parade tomorrow evening, July 27, for her efforts in behalf of the late Dr. Koussevitzky's many musical causes, and for her leadership in the Boston Symphony's Friends of Music at Tanglewood. A variety of musical events will take place beginning at 6:30 p.m. to celebrate the occasion.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225
JUL 23 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to honor Mrs. Koussevitzky

LENOX—Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

During the 22 years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, Mrs. Koussevitzky has been a tireless champion of the many musical causes he worked for and, has exerted great leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. The Berkshire Music Center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long-time dream of a unique summer academy where the most talented young musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Berkshire Music Center now account for more than ten per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some thirty per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5.30 p.m. on July 27. At 6.30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations take place in three locations, the formal garden, the porch of the Main House, and the Tent.

At 8.30 p.m., the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to The Flying Dutchman by Wagner.

140

Tanglewood To Hail Widow Of Conductor

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, to be conducted on July 27, will honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . "Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

JUL 25 1971

Music Demonstration

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of work of students at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., will take place starting at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday. Beginning at 6:30 p.m., there will be performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 10 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Honors Mrs. Koussevitzky

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday, July 27, at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center.

Continued Husband's Work

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra

Whitestone
Mrs. Koussevitzky

will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure," conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hunding.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 40,675

JUL 16 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Hail Widow Of Conductor

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, to be conducted on July 27, will honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in nemory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Sauders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of he Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethven concerts conducted by Wiliam Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . "Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 9 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Honor Mrs. Koussevitzky

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday, July 27, at Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, Mrs. Koussevitzky has been a tireless champion of the many musical cuases he worked for and, in particular, she has exerted great leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long - time dream of a unique summer academy where the most talented young musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making.

Alumni of the Berkshire Music Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some thirty per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. on July 27. At 6:30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations take place in three locations, the formal garden, the porch of the Main House, and the Tent.

At 8:30 p.m., the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act 1 of Wagner's "Die Walkure," conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Sieglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbierei is Hunding.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679

JUL 15 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Honor Koussevitsky's Widow

Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in futhering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long-time dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . "Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

140

B. Eagle 7/25/71

Tanglewood To Hail Widow Of Conductor

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, to be conducted on July 27, will honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . ."Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
JUL 25 1971

Music Demonstration

"Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of work of students at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., will take place starting at 5:30 p.m. Tuesday. Beginning at 6:30 p.m., there will be performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 10 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Honors Mrs. Koussevitzky

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday, July 27, at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center.

Continued Husband's Work

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

Whitestone
Mrs. Koussevitzky

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure," conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hunding.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 40,675
JUL 16 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Hail Widow Of Conductor

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, to be conducted on July 27, will honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by Wiliam Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . ."Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
JUL 9 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Honor Mrs. Koussevitzky

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday, July 27, at Tanglewood - on - Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, Mrs. Koussevitzky has been a tireless champion of the many musical cuases he worked for and, in particular, she has exerted great leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long - time dream of a unique summer academy where the most talented young musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making.

Alumni of the Berkshire Music Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some thirty per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. on July 27. At 6:30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations take place in three locations, the formal garden, the porch of the Main House, and the Tent.

At 8:30 p.m., the Gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the Suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act 1 of Wagner's "Die Walkure," conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Sieglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbierei is Hunding.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 26,679
JUL 15 1971
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Honor Koussevitsky's Widow

Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center.

During the 20 years since Dr. Koussevitsky's death, his wife has been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for, and in particular, she has taken the leadership in futhering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The music center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Koussevitsky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his longtime dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making. Alumni of the Center now account for more than 10 per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some 30 per cent of them are concermasters or principal players.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. At 6:30 sumultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place in the formal garden, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent.

The gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin at 8:30, with Boston Symphony associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa then conducts the suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure" conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Seiglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hundig.

On July 25 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood's Advisor, conducts the Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, his teacher and mentor, and the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. Berstein is joined in this performance by soprano Arlene Saunders, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor William Cochran, baritone Sherrill Milnes, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director.

The Friday and Saturday concerts of the Fourth Berkshire Festival's weekend will feature all-Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg. One of the exciting Violin virtuoso performances will be Itzhak Perlman Friday evening playing Beethoven's violin concerto in D.

Next week-end, the third in the Tanglewood series, will feature two all Brahms programs on Friday and Saturday, conducted by William Steinberg. Sunday afternoon Seiji Ozawa conducts the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture and the last half of the concert will also feature Brahms. . ."Alto Rhapsody with Maureen Forrester, soloist, and Brahms Haydn variations.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

JUL 22 1971 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored Tuesday, July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of work by young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

During the twenty years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, Mrs. Koussevitzky has been a tireless champion of his many musical causes. In particular, she has exerted great leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long-time dream of a unique summer academy where the most talented young musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music-making.

Alumni of the Berkshire Music Center now account for more than ten percent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some thirty percent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5:30 p.m. on July 27. At 6:30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes, arias and dance demonstrations will take place in three locations, the formal garden, the porch of the Main House, and the Tent.

At 8:30 p.m. the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will begin with the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the overture to The Flying Dutchman by Wagner. Tanglewood artistic director Seiji Ozawa will then conduct the Suite from The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok. The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's Die Walkure, conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Sieglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hunding.

Mrs. Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Koussevitzky to Be Honored

LENOX — Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949, will be honored July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. Tanglewood.

During the twenty years since Dr. Koussevitzky's death, Mrs. Koussevitzky has been a tireless champion of the many musical causes he worked for and, in particular, she has exerted great leadership in furthering the work of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and guided by Dr. Koussevitzky for the remainder of his life, fulfilled his long-time dream of a unique summer academy where the most talented young musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making.

Alumni of the Berkshire Music Center now account for more than ten per cent of the players in the major orchestras in this country, and some thirty per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

Open at 5.30

The Tanglewood grounds will open to the public at 5.30 p.m. on July 27. At 6.30 p.m. simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations take place in three locations, the formal garden, the porch of the Main House and the Tent.

At 8.30 p.m. the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra begins with the Boston Symphony's Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" by Wagner.

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seija Ozawa then will conduct the suite from "The Miraculo Mandarin" by Bartok.

The principal work of the evening is a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," conducted by Tanglewood's other artistic director, Gunther Schuller. Soprano Linda Phillips is Sieglinde, tenor Henry Grossman is Siegmund, and bass Saverio Barbieri is Hunding.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be guest of honor at a reception preceding the concert.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

JUL 16 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, at the beautiful grounds in Lenox, is going to honor Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the Boston Symphony's conductor from 1924 through 1949. It is slated for July 27, a Tuesday evening.

The Parade is being devoted to a woman who has, since the death of her husband, been a champion of the many musical causes he worked for and has taken a particularly keen interest in furthering the work of the Friends of Tanglewood. Mrs. Koussevitsky will be a guest at a reception prior to the concert.

The music center was founded at Tanglewood in 1940 and Koussevitsky guided it for the remainder of his life and it was something which fulfilled his dream of a unique summer academy where talented musicians could gather each summer for a session of intense and dedicated music making.

Evidence of its success is the fact that alumni of the Center account for more than 10 per cent of the players in major orchestras in the United States. And 30 per cent of them are concertmasters or principal players.

On Parade night the grounds open at 5:30 and starting at 6:30 there will be simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations in the formal gardens, on the porch of the Main House and in the Tent. The gala concert will get underway at 8:30.

THE ORACLE

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

JUL 23 1971

TANGLEWOOD ON PARADE, the annual demonstration of the work of students of the Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass., takes place Tuesday evening on the Tanglewood grounds beginning at 6:30.

Simultaneous performances of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will be performed in three locations, the formal gardens, the porch of the main house and in the Tanglewood tent.

At 8:30 the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will perform in the Shed with Mr. Thomas conducting the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be honored during the evening.

CONCERT at Lambert Castle in the Passaic County Park Commission series will begin at 2 p.m. Sunday with a slight change in the announced program.

Pete and Bobby Dominick, banjo playing brothers, who opened the park concert series June 27, were scheduled for a second appearance, but Pete suffered a heart attack and will not be there. In his place, however, he is sending a couple of his 12-year-old proteges to perform with his brother. The youngsters are Bobby Scerbak and Dennis O'Hanlon.

Also appearing Sunday by popular request will be the Clifton Folk singers, a group of Clifton High School students under the direction of Frank Rainey, and the Mike Testa Combo.

FAIR LAWN FESTIVAL program at Memorial Park at 8:30 Sunday evening will present music in the style of the "Swinging Thirties to the Hip Seventies." All of the tunes selected keep the theme, "Big Band."

The conductor will be Richard Lowenthal, assistant professor of music at Jersey City State College. Aside from directing the Brass Ensemble and performing with the Faculty Trio, he leads the Stage Band, which plays frequently in the Metropolitan area.

MILTON TILSON THOMAS.

Following the regularly scheduled jazz concert, Mr. Lowenthal and the orchestra will play for dancing in which the audience will be invited to participate.

Rose Walsh

Judge Sullivan to be Feted at Party

Boston historians, the legal profession and representatives of old Boston families will be among the guests honoring Judge Robert Sullivan at a party being given by Dr. and Mrs. J. Holland Cotter of Weston tomorrow afternoon at the Women's City Club 40 Beacon st. The Judge is the author of "The Disappearance of Dr. Parkman" which Little, Brown & Co. is bringing out on Thursday.

One of Boston's richest men, as well as one of the country's first psychiatrists (and uncle of the distinguished historian, Francis Parkman), Dr. George Parkman left his Walnut st., Beacon Hill home on the morning of Nov. 23, 1849.

A week later, the day after Thanksgiving, his dismembered body was found behind the wall of a vault at Harvard Medical College. John White Webster of Cambridge, professor of chemistry at the Medical College was found guilty of the murder. Five months later he was hung for the crime in the courtyard of the Leverett Street jail.

Judge Sullivan's fascinating book takes a startling new look at the 120-year old trial which he finds surrounded with a host of ambiguities and unanswered questions.

The Cotters party invitation list includes Dr. Walter Muir Whitehill, Dr. and Mrs. Guy Pesce (she is an author); Mr. and Mrs. Robert Montgomery, the Charles Everitts, Mr. and Mrs. W. Devereaux Barker, Mr. and Mrs. Harold G. Kern, the Edward Bernays, Richard Crouch, the James Salahs.

★

A reception for the 13 freshman class members of the North Shore Children's Hospital School of Practical Nursing, Salem, who were capped by Miss Edna, J. Townsend, R. N., its director, was hostessed by the Hospital Auxiliary yesterday, afternoon.

Having completed the first six months of their studies, the young women will continue their education and clinical experience in medical, surgical and obstetrical nursing care of adults at Emerson Hospital in Concord.

In the group were Elaine M. Dube and Alice D. Stevens of Salem; Sharon L. Allen of Lee; Karlene M. Antonnoni, Bradford; Martha A. Ballou, Reading; Deborah A. Dalrymple, Lexington; Patricia A. Dozier, Melrose; Linda K. Hamilton, Manchester.

Also Deborah A. Hutchings of Peabody; Louise D. Leger, Gardner; Helen F. Mills, Scituate; Joan O'Donnell, Concord; and Jean M. Surette, Saugus.

★

Tomorrow evening, Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual demonstration of the students of the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox begins at 6:30 (grounds open to the public at 5:30). In the formal gardens, the porch of the Main House and in the Tanglewood Tent, simultaneous performance of opera scenes and arias and dance demonstrations will take place.

Boston Symphony Associate Conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, will conduct the gala concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at 8:30 in the Shed. Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will climax the festivities.

Friday the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed features the Berkshire Boy Choir performing music from the Renaissance.

The summer's fifth Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal, held each Saturday morning in the Shed, is scheduled for 10:30 a.m. Seats are unreserved at $2.50 each and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. Proceeds benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

RECORD AMERICAN
(ALL DAY)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 415,231

JUL 26 1971 New England Newsclip

142

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

JUL 24 1971

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood on Parade

Where Stars-To-Be May Test Their Talent

As Siegmund and Sieglinde in Wagner's "Die Walkuere," singers Henry Grossman and Linda Phillips sing together for the first time.

By Archer Mayor

LENOX, Mass.

EACH YEAR, students attending the eight-week summer school at Berkshire Music Center step before the public for a gala night of performances ripe for the professional world. The occasion is Tanglewood on Parade, the annual benefit for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be held this year on Tuesday, July 27, at 6:30 p.m.

Henry Grossman and Linda Phillips are two such students; holding high hopes for successful careers in the opera, they are battling through Tanglewood's singing classes taught, according to them, by some of the best in the business. They have been chosen to sing in the principal work to be presented during Tanglewood on Parade, Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," because they typify what the Center stands for. Both are young, have sung before and, according to their choral conductor, just need the final polish Tanglewood can supply before starting out on professional careers.

Linda Phillips, the more experienced of the two, fully realizes this: "We're all on the brink of becoming pros, in fact, some have come here just because they find the program attractive. This place is in many ways unique; for eight weeks, you can concentrate peacefully, away from the outside world. This is my second summer here, and I just love it."

Miss Phillips started singing at 18 ("I give my age now as being 28, but that's not far from the truth") and has been improving ever since under the careful guidance of some of the best voice masters around, both here and in Europe. She studied several years in Berlin.

Mr. Mayor, assistant editor of Berkshire Week, is a junior at Yale.

Henry Grossman was a photographer for Life magazine just a few years ago.

"What motivated me to turn to opera was that it forces me to use more of myself than photography ever did. The artistry of the photographer tends to hide in the darkroom, but singing demands that you expose yourself as an artist, and that is very tough.

"In effect, to be a good singer, you have to open your soul and start trusting the people around you. If you have any doubts by the time you hit the stage, that uncertainty pours right over the footlights into the audience."

In making this fragile transition from private person to artist, both singers find Tanglewood of great help.

Linda found that living as an opera singer in New York City sometimes got difficult. "People just couldn't believe that singing was my profession. 'You mean you do that? All the time?' Its hard for them to believe the life you lead, never knowing where you're going next. For them, it's like a ball and chain."

Henry tells of the conflict he has between his social life and his professional one: "I went out on a date, and ended up feeling so guilty about not being home studying my lessons that finally the girl I was with told me she wouldn't take offense if I cut the evening short and went back to the books. But for me that wasn't a hassle; in fact, when I finally was able to break away from my studies and go out on the town, I found I didn't enjoy myself as much as I had at home."

The enthusiasm is understandable when the final goal is taken into account. As Henry puts it bluntly: "Not shooting for the top is self-defeating. If you know you can make it, then even if you fall by the wayside, you know you've accomplished a great deal."

It has been said that most opera singers were saddled with an almost mind-boggling ego, but again Grossman steps in to defend the profession: "It's not ego, it's a desire to talk about your work. I mean, this music really is all-absorbing; singing is the art fulfilling the man, not vice versa."

Those are the artists as they stand ready for Tanglewood on Parade, However, their ambitions and hopes for the future are necessarily for themselves, and not really for the music center they use as a stepping stone in their careers.

Much of the spiritual support for Tanglewood on Parade comes from Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the late conductor Serge Koussevitzky. For years, she has been fighting to keep interest, money and talent flowing in until the formation of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood began to ease the pressure.

Now one of her big battles is under control and she can confidently say, "The spirit is still there, 20 years after Koussevitzky's death. After many troubles, still Tanglewood lives, still talent is being discovered every year. I have the belief that it will carry on from strength to strength."

This year, Tanglewood on Parade was dedicated to her.

The grounds will open at 5:30 p.m. for the event. Dance and opera scenes will be performed on the lawn at 6:30. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will play at 8:30 p.m. ■

Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, to be honored at Tanglewood on Parade.

Eagle 7/28/71

MORGANTOWN, W. VA.
DOMINION-POST
SUN. 14,500

JUL 25 1971

LINDA PHILLIPS, a native of Morgantown, will be featured as Sieglinde in a concert performance of Wagner's "Die Walkure" July 27 at Tanglewood-on-Parade in Boston. Miss Phillips is a vocal fellow at the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy for the advanced study of music. The soprano received her Bachelor of Music degree from West Virginia University. She then continued her studies at the New England Conservatory of Music where she received both a Master of Music degree and Artist Diploma. She has been continuing her Linda is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Phillips of 465 Kiwanis Ave.

ial News Community Events

Highlights of Tanglewood on Parade

Whitestone

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky thanks audience of 4,422 who attended last evening's gala concert which honored her. Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented her a scroll inscribed by directors.

Whitestone

Mrs. Alice M. Miller of Stockbridge and St. Louis, J. Haines Spencer of Pittsfield and William Ryan of Stockbridge, had preconcert refreshments at Tanglewood Tent Club. Fireworks concluded evening.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 21 1971

New England Newsclip

Soprano Linda Phillips To Sing Sieglinde Role

Soprano Linda Phillips, a vocal fellow at the Berkshire Music Center and student of Wagnerian roles, will sing the role of Sieglinde in the Tanglewood-on-Parade performance of Wagner's "Die Walkure," on

Linda Phillips

Tuesday at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Gunther Schuller, artistic director at Tanglewood will conduct the concert performance.

Miss Phillips was winner of the Leonard Bernstein Fellowship and the Musical America-High Fidelity Prize at the Berkshire Music Center last summer. She holds bachelor of music degrees from West Virginia University and the New England Conservatory of Music as well as an artist diploma from the conservatory. As winner of the Frank Huntington Beebe Award, she studied Wagnerian roles in Berlin, Germany.

The singer has been soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Framingham Choral Society and has appeared with the American National Opera Company and the Boston Opera Company. She was a hational semifinalist in the Metropolitan Opera auditions, and scholarships from the Met are enabling her to continue her studies in New York.

Festivities for Tanglewood-on-Parade will begin at 5:30 when the grounds open. Music and dance demonstrations begin at 6:30 p.m., and a reception for Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be held at 7:30 p.m. An exhibit of sketches by Mrs. Koussevitzky will be on view in the Glass House at Tanglewood, and autographed copies of them will be sold prior to the concert.

The gala concert will begin at 8:30 with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Wagner's overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander." Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in Bartok's suite from "The Miraculous Mandarin." Henry Grossman as Siegmund and Saverio Barbieri as Hunding will join Miss Phillips in the second-half of the program. Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will conclude the evening.

144

Eagle 7/28/71

Whitestone

CARTWHEELS spiced the air for picnickers at Tanglewood on Parade yesterday. Students of the Berkshire Music Center entertained the 4,400 who turned out to witness dance, opera and a full concert by the BSO.

Music Review

Tanglewood-on-Parade Is Just That

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE GALA CONCERT which last night was the climax of the annual Tanglewood - on - Parade was made the occasion of honoring Olga Koussevitzky, the widow of Serge Koussevitzky, the founder of the Berkshire Music Center. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to its summer terrain in 1936, its internationally famous conductor soon was able to establish the concentrated academy for postgraduate music students, which had long been his ambition.

At the start of the second-half of the program, orchestra manager Thomas D. Perry Jr., escorted Mme. Koussevitzky to the stage apron where he presented her a scroll signed by the current associate directors of Tanglewood, Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa, and the musical adviser, Leonard Bernstein. In a short gracious response, she humbly disclaimed credit for the dominant magnitude to which the school has developed but rejoiced to see her late husband's dream come true.

* * *

TANGLEWOOD-on-Parade is an opportunity for the Center to exhibit some of its activities to the public. More than 4,400 people passed through the stiles to picnic on the lawns under as perfect a Berkshire July afternoon as Manager Perry could have provided, and then attend the various recitals, short operas and dance programs. Lacking only was any evidence of the chamber music functions which are always such an important part of the school's curriculum.

The Berkshire Music Center orchestra, a huge ensemble which completely filled the great Shed stage, played for three conductors: Michael Tilson Thomas, in the Overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," Ozawa in the suite from Bartok's "The Miraculous Mandarin," and Schuller in Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkure." Noticeable was the preponderance of girls in the string sections, 18 out of the 24 first and second violins being handsome young ladies with fascinating short skirts, a factor which affected their playing insofar as they kept their knees together.

* * *

FOR THE OPERA, a minimal attempt to provide background consisted of playing shaded lights on the three excellent singers placed on an elevated platform to the rear of the orchestra as they moved about in Hunding's nonexistent but imaginative cottage. The two male protagonists, Henry Grossman as Siegmund and Saverio Barbieri as Hunding, wore proper Wagnerian overblouses; the heroine Sieglinde, Linda Phillips, wore a long ceremonial gown, beautiful but not particularly forest-like. At the moment when Siegmund draws the sword from the ash tree a spotlight illuminated the action. Otherwise there was the usual immobile stage action while the orchestra vividly tells the story. The vocalists displayed strong, fresh and vital voices and a thorough familiarity with their roles.

Professional conductors working with semipro forces are apt to exhort their musicians with extra ardor. All three conductors last night probably unconsciously resorted to this gambit and, it must be said, they were rewarded with an equal degree of force and energy by their orchestra. The results delighted their cordial audience.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

MAY 9 1971 New England Newsclip

A Day In The Arts...

Council gives out $150,000 each year

Helping to keep the arts lively

By Nathan Cobb
Globe Staff

If you have never heard of the Mass. Council on the Arts and Humanities, you are not particularly alone.

The fact that such a state agency exists — and is responsible for doling out the $150,000 or so dollars in state and Federal funds annually deem fit to bestow upon the arts in the Bay State — seems to remain one of the least known in the Commonwealth.

But the Council is here, all right, With a staff of three working on day-to-day details at 3 Joy st. in Boston and the 15 councilors themselves convening once a month to decide what money will go where, the agency is helping to fund 61 projects by various arts groups in Massachusetts in 1971. It has been operating since 1966.

Since the sponsorship rate is now higher than one per week, it might be expected that the Council would be a bit more conspicuous. But the dissemination of mass information (public relations) has apparently never been its strong suit. As John R. Watts, Council chairman and assistant dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts admitted recently, "We've been very poor at informing people on what we're doing and why."

In all fairness, however, there appears to be another problem: money. Although both Watts and the Council's energetic executive director, Louise G. Tate, feel the trend is now shifting, politicians have traditionally tended to view the arts as an elite frill to be dealt with only after such necessities as, say, road-building.

For example, Gov. Sargent has cut the council's proposed budgets by an average of 33 percent over the past four years, while the Legislature has lopped off another 20 percent of what was left.

As a result, while the $160,000 given to the council for fiscal 1971 ranks the Commonwealth 11th in the country on the basis of the amount it spends on the arts, the 2.812 cents per capita this represents puts it 26th.

This figure is well less than half the 6.643 cents averaged by the other five New England states. Only New Hampshire ranks lower.

TRY IT! One of the children who participated in "A Day in the Arts" at Tanglewood tries out a bassoon. This project, begun in the summer of 1968, was sponsored by the Council on the Arts and Humanities and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Photo courtesy of the Berkshire Week)

The pot is sweetened a bit by the National Endowment for the Arts, which antes up $75,377 to each state and for which the council is the sole agent in Massachusetts. But this is more than negated by the fact it is costing the council $81,900 for facilities, supplies, salaries and outside professional consultants in fiscal 1971.

What all this means is that it has $153,000 to hand out for arts projects in Massachusetts this year — about 2 cents for every man, woman and child in the Commonwealth.

For the record, the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities was created by Chapter 589 of the Acts of 1966 to "stimulate and encourage throughout the Commonwealth the practice, study and appreciation of the arts and humanities in the public interest."

The legislation was recommended by a special commission which had been appointed by Gov. Endicott Peabody in 1964 to study the cultural resources and needs of the Commonwealth. It found the former less than adequate and the latter more than substantial, a none-too-unexpected pair of revelations.

The members of the Council — artists, educators, attorneys, architects, and directors and trustees of various arts organizations — are appointed by the Governor for three-year terms. He also appoints the chairman, who in turn designates an executive director with the blessing of the majority of the Council.

Miss Tate has been on her job since the Council's inception, while Watts has been chairman since Jan., 1967.

The Council "stimulates" and "encourages" the arts in the most direct way possible — by giving money. Since state law prohibits flat grants of public funds to private organizations, the allocations technically represent reimbursements for "services rendered." In an arts group's project is accepted for funding, it must meet its expenses out-of-pocket and hold off its creditors until the state auditor has scrutinized the bills.

The funds are usually supplements by the applicants through other sources, many of whom are uncovered for them by the Council itself. "We act as sort of a marriage broker, bringing arts groups together with supporting groups," Watts said.

Later the chairman was asked why such private and business contributions haven't been funneled directly through the Council. "We know that once we go after private and business money, we won't get government funds so readily," he replied.

In nearly five years of existence, the Council has channeled money for exhibitions, festivals, performances, restorations, workshops instruction, studies, concerts and television productions in some 270 communities.

It has spanned music, dance, art, film, theater, poetry, architecture history and even horticulture.

Allotments have gone to opera companies, orchestras, ballet troups, choral societies, museums, foundations, historical societies, theater groups, antiquarian societies, municipalities, philharmonic societies, conservatories and schools, anthenaeums, horticultural societies, educational television stations and general and neighborhood arts groups and councils.

But there have also been criticisms:

—That the Council has been too remote (it now publishes a newsletter and has just begun holding meetings across the state);

—That it is concerned with quantity, not quality ("I'm afraid the numbers of people are the hyperconcern of any government agency," countered Watts);

—That money has gone to relatively well-to-do groups which could have gotten it elsewhere ("but perhaps it moved them into areas in which they wouldn't have gone," the chairman replied);

—And that arts groups need money for operating costs more than special projects (here state law specifies that money must go for specific "services rendered").

Another often-heard criticism, launched mainly by groups whose applications have been rejected, is that the Council is more establishment-oriented than experiment-oriented.

Indeed, almost one dollar in five appropriated by the Council during the past three years has gone to Boston's "big five": the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Museum of Fine Arts, Boston Opera Co., Institute of Contemporary Art and Boston Ballet Co

In addition, of the 16 applications filed by these groups during the same time period, only three have been turned down. The rejection rate for all other groups has been about 50 percent over the past three years.

Yet if some arts groups are critical of the Council, the Council in turn is frustrated by the attitude of many groups. "We've always had a big battle with their apathy," Miss Tate said last week. "We just haven't had the kind of response we expected from the arts community across the State."

When the original special commission sent out questionaires to various arts groups about a possible Council in 1964, only 56 percent bothered to reply.

"The organizations seem to be afraid to ask for money for the arts in light of other pressing needs," Miss Tate added. "In fact, they seem almost embarrassed."

Nevertheless, the Council coffer has slowly grown. It was opened with but $25,000 in State funds in 1967, and has been parlayed up to $160,000 for 1971. Although the request for $200,000 for 1972 has already been slashed $40,000 by the Governor, Massachusetts has moved from 20th to 11th place in the nation in one year in money appropriated for the arts.

"We learned," smiled Watts, "that the legislators are not rednecks who are opposed to the arts. There has been, we've found, a tremendous growth in support once they found out the arts don't necessarily mean black ties."

Then he paused, and added: "And once they found out what it is we do."

RECORDER GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
D. 14,698

JUL 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Orchestra In Debt

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said Wednesday the orchestra is going into the cassette tape business, plans to do more recording and will appear more on television.

Thomas Morris of Westboro told the Kiwanis Club that the orchestra is burdened with a $1.7 million deficit.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUN 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Friends of Tanglewood

Friends of Tanglewood List Program and Goal

LENOX — The office of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood is now open. Located next to Tanglewood's main gate, the office will be open initially from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Weekend hours will be announced at a later date.

All Over U.S.

Members of the Tanglewood Friends are people from all over the United States who contribute their financial support to Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Tanglewood summer academy for the advanced study of music. The Friends' membership drive, under the direction of Mrs. Henry J. Wheelwright of Lenox, has already enlisted 150 new Friends for the 1971 summer season. These memberships entitle the Friend to attend more than 30 concerts, free of charge, by the students and faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Many special events have been planned for the Friends for the coming summer at Tanglewood. A dinner-dance will be held June 26 on the stage of the Shed, proceeds to benefit the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center. Tickets are available from Mrs. John McLennan of Tyringham. Michael Tilson Thomas will speak at the first Friends lecture-luncheon to be held in the Tent on July 1.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the day devoted to music by Berkshire Music Center students, takes place on July 27. The day's festivities conclude with a gala concert in the evening, the proceeds are to benefit the Berkshire Music Center. Special box seats for patrons are available and may be ordered from Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, chairman of the Tanglewood-on-Parade committee.

Members of the Friends also receive "Tanglewood News," a newsletter devoted to the activities of the Boston Symphony.

Further information regarding the Friends activities may be obtained by calling Miss Mary Riley at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 2 1971 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Sponsor Buffets

Special catered suppers will be held before the concert every Saturday in the Tanglewood Tent. They will be open to all season and daily Tent members.

The Tent, located behind the Shed, is open an hour before and after each concert and during intermissions. Membership is available on either a seasonal or daily basis. The Tent will open tonight at 6, and the first buffet dinner will be served next Saturday evening.

Further information is available from the Friends of Tanglewood office in Lenox.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

JUL 8 1971 New England Newsclip

Symphony Hoping To Reduce Deficit

PITTSFIELD — The treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra told a Pittsfield Kiwanis Club audience of the Stanley Club Wednesday afternoon that the deficit-ridden orchestra is launching a campaign to market its product more effectively in an effort to break into the black.

New Fields

Thomas Morris of Westboro said the campaign will bring the BSO into the cassette music field in an attempt to reach larger audiences, and will involve increased recording activity and the use of television to promote the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony, which owns and operates its own summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox as well as a winter home at Symphony Hall in Boston, suffers from a net deficit of $1.7 million, $325,000 of it incurred during the last fiscal year.

"The biggest factor is just personnel, maintaining a 105 piece orchestra year-round, plus conductor costs, soloists, artistic personnel. That's over 50 per cent of our budget," Morris said.

Little Expenses

"In addition to that, when we give a concert anywhere there are all kinds of little expenses that creep in — ushers, programs, piano tuning, music rental, to say nothing of just the cost of maintaining Symphony Hall and Tanglewood."

Musicians must be paid a per diem fee and transportation charges are exorbitant, Morris said, whenever the orchestra goes on tour. Ten tons of instruments and equipment accompanied the BSO to Europe two months ago.

Ticket sales, recording royalties, contributions and endowment income fail to blanace the orchestra's budget, but Morris stressed that the organization wants to avoid any large increase in prices to concertgoers.

"Worth It"

"What we are tryng to do is reduce that deficit so we can keep functioning." Morris argued. "It's kind of silly to be treasurer of an organization that loses so much money, but all you have to do is listen to some of our concerts, and I think you'll agree that it's worth it."

Morris made it clear that the BSO needs and wants as much support from the private sector as possible to continue to maintain its Tanglewood schedule.

The Friends of Tanglewood and the Friends of the Boston Symphony in Boston are the two key privately organized groups aimed at stimulating annual contributions from private sources.

146

Boston Pops At Tanglewood

8 Springfield Union, Springfield, Mass., Tuesday, August 3, 1971

Fiedler 'Pops' Conductor At Tanglewood Tonight

ARTHUR FIELDLER

LENOX — Arthur Fiedler comes to Tanglewood tonight to conduct the annual Boston Pops pension fund concert at 8.30 in The Shed.

Featured with him in an all-Tchaikovsky concert is pianist Earl Wild. The concert begins with the Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," followed by Wild's performance of the Piano concerto no. 1.

Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Suite from "Swan Lake" and a performance of the "1812 Overture," complete with cannons. Following the concert, there will be fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

The cannons used during the performance of the "1812 Overture" are from the private collection of George Bisacca, manager of Eastover Resort in Lenox. Six different cannons will be used during the Overture: one eight pound cannon, three 10 pound cannons and two 12 pound cannons. The 10 pounder, made in England, was used during the Revolutionary War. The eight and 12 pound cannons were made in the United States and used during the Civil War.

Firing the cannons during the performance will be Bisacca and Johnny Valeri. The cannons are muzzle loaded. Gun powder must first be put into the barrel of the cannon and then a primer added which is used to ignite the powder. The 12 pound cannon is fired every week as part of the antique fire arms demonstration at Eastover.

Californian Gets Sick After Hashhish Arrest

HOULTON, Maine (UPI) — Police arrested a California man Monday in connection with the finding of $1 million in hashhish last Friday at the U.S. Customs border station here.

Graylin Gleason, 21, of Los Angeles was arrested while hitchhiking on Rte. 2A south of Houlton. He became "violently ill" after his arrest and was taken to the police station.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 3 1971
New England Newsclip

Eastover Cannons Being Used Tonight For Pops Concert

LENOX — For the third time in recent years, the bombastic militarism of Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture" will resonate throughout Tanglewood when authentic vintage cannons from Eastover Resort combine with the Boston Pops, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, in the annual pension fund concert tonight beginning at 8:30.

According to Eastover owner George J. Bisacca, six cannons will be used — and 8-pounder and two 12-pounders, all veterans of the Civil War, and three 10-pounders made in England and used in the Revolutionary War. Sounds of musket fire will be provided by about 100 aerial explosive blanks, Bisacca said.

The cannons are muzzle-loaded with black powder and fired on cue from outside the Tanglewood Shed. Only state-licensed persons are permitted to fire the cannons, so, once again, only Bisacca, son-in-law Robert McNinch and Eastover employe John Valeri will "perform" the cannon passages under Fielder's baton.

"Timing is critical," Bisacca said yesterday. "There'll be an assistant conductor out there with us who'll be watching a TV monitor of Fiedler conducting. He'll cue us with a flashlight."

As in the past, the $350 fee paid to Eastover by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be turned over to the Eastover-Lenox Memorial High School scholarship fund, Bisacca said.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398
AUG 3 1971
New England Newsclip

Fiedler 'Pops' Conductor At Tanglewood Tonight

ARTHUR FIEDLER

LENOX — Arthur Fiedler comes to Tanglewood tonight to conduct the annual Boston Pops pension fund concert at 8.30 in The Shed.

Featured with him in an all-Tchaikovsky concert is pianist Earl Wild. The concert begins with the Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," followed by Wild's performance of the Piano concerto no. 1.

Following intermission, Mr. Fiedler conducts the Suite from "Swan Lake" and a performance of the "1812 Overture," complete with cannons. Following the concert, there will be fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

The cannons used during the performance of the "1812 Overture" are from the private collection of George Bisacca, manager of Eastover Resort in Lenox. Six different cannons will be used during the Overture: one eight pound cannon, three 10 pound cannons and two 12 pound cannons. The 10 pounder, made in England, was used during the Revolutionary War. The eight and 12 pound cannons were made in the United States and used during the Civil War.

Firing the cannons during the performance will be Bisacca and Johnny Valeri. The cannons are muzzle loaded. Gun powder must first be put into the barrel of the cannon and then a primer added which is used to ignite the powder. The 12 pound cannon is fired every week as part of the antique fire arms demonstration at Eastover.

147

Eagle 8/4/71

Social News Community Events

9,626 Attend Pops at Tanglewood in Rain

Usherettes with programs are June Stankiewicz of Pittsfield High, Pam Taylor of BCC, and Carolyn Wall of Lowell State University. All three are Pittsfield girls.

Whitestone

Expressions vary on faces of the Rudge family, who are visiting Bill Rudge's parents in Lenox. With Mr. and Mrs. Rudge are Billy, 11, David, 8, Laurie, 10, and Susan, 7.

Whitestone

The Most Rev. Christopher J. Weldon, bishop of the Springfield diocese, also attended.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 79,398

AUG 5 1971 New England Newsclip

Fireworks Fly For Fiedler's '1812'

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — Everybody, all 9600 of them, had a bang-up good time at the Pops concert at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Arthur Fiedler, who, like old man river, just goes majestically on and on and on and on, was at his usual boisterous best. The audience gave him and the Pops orchestra a standing ovation that even a persistent drizzle couldn't dampen. The rain, fortunately, didn't dampen the powder for the cannon used in the "1812 Overture" or the final firework display either.

The evening didn't fizzle.

Fiedler and Earl Wild, in baby blue and baby pink jackets, were the stars of this all-Tchaikovsky program. Wild, a pianist of awesome technical expertise, played the Tchaikovsky "Piano Concert No. I" After his display of pyrotechniques in the bravura second movement, the audience stopped the piece and he took several bows before the concerto could be finished. The polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" and a somewhat bland arrangement of pieces from "Swan Lake" filled out the program. Violinist Max Hobart and harpist Ann Hobson sounded lush and romantic in their duo. There was a little something for everyone including children. The classics sweetened with schmaltz and fun.

It all built up to that old war horse, the "1812 Overture." The neighbors must be getting used to the cannonading with real cannons by now, it is almost becoming a Pops at Tanglewood annual feature. George Bisacca, with two helpers, uses six muzzle-loading cannons and a lot of blanks to make a blinding, deafening finale.

Then came the encores, tidbits for a happy audience: a rhythmic Beatles, a bouncy, soupy, popular "Look What They've Done To My Song, Ma" with the musicians la-la-laing along with the catchy tune and the standard "Stars and Stripes Forever" with more cannonading. Fireworks for dessert, and a filling, if not oo nourishing, musical meal vas had by all.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 4 1971 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

GENERAL GEORGE BISACCA of the Eastover raiders, in the white uniform, center, leads his artillery last night in their traditional role in the "1812 Overture" performed at Tanglewood's Pops concert.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,200

AUG 10 1971 New England Newsclip

Fiedler, Pops Capture 10,000

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

"In his hometown of Boston," the program read, on the occasion of this season's Boston Pops all-Tschaikovsky concert at Tanglewood last evening, "Arthur Fiedler is an institution."

We think the writer was limiting this beloved conductor's institutional and geographical scope.

Certainly the nearly 10,000 who crowded the Shed and sprawled on the rain-sodden lawns indicated other than Bostonians who hold dear Fiedler's unique musical showmanship.

The programming displayed Fiedler's sure sense of balance, starting with the Polonaise from Eugen Onegin, which sounded almost effete, so reserved was its style, and ending the first half with the flashy first piano concerto in B minor.

Here the audience's animated acclaim poured forth onto a longtime favorite pianist, Earl Wild.

His performance was brilliant, those massive chor passages picked off with little effort in virtuoso fashion, the octave runs only a bit rough occasionally.

But it wasn't a particularly inspired reading, even though Wild strove to make it so, lingering over the andante with loving tenderness and restraining the rubato of the popular "blind beggar" theme of the allegro.

We hate to be chauvinistic about pianos, but his chosen instrument just doesn't match the warmth of the orchestral tone, its resonacen too contained, too removed.

We could liken the color to that of his slate blue jacket, and wish that it had matched Fiedler's warm rose one.

Another popular work of this composer, the Suite from his ballet "Swan Lake" began the second section. Here Ann Hobson displayed an agile and graceful musicianship with her harp solo during the valse, and the evening's concertmaster Max Hobart, a tentative, contained tone, and a kind of strained remote quality in his haunting melodies.

The cellist, Martin Hoherman, revealed a vibrant and sympathetic interpretation. It was a perfect prelude for the ensuing overture.

Here the tinder-dry sparks of the audience's enthusiasm was lit by a smoldering emotion, that erupted occasionally into scattered flashes, and ended in wild bursts of thunderous acclaim when cannon boomed and blossomed with bright light during the 1912 Overture solennelle.

No doubt about this being the high point of the evening. But it wasn't the last number, as the program noted.

The expected encores began, names exhibited in large print on the usual cards, with "Bond Street", its sassy syncopated rhythms matched by hand-claps from the less reserved listeners.

"Look What They've Done To My Song" brought forth all the fun-producing variations, sone of the violinists strumming their instruments, others singing the melody and tapping, again eliciting uninhibited responses from the audience in a wave of participating pleasure the Pops always provokes.

It was a good thing, too, because the firework display was waiting to top off the evening.

148

CHATHAM, N. Y.
COURIER
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 6,000

AUG 5 1971

CHATHAM, N. Y.
COURIER
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 6,000

AUG 5 1971

Music

The Boston Pops . . Plus Fireworks

It has been said about Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, that he is an institution. And to put Arthur Fiedler, the Boston Pops and another institution, Tanglewood, all together on a hazy August night is to create happiness.

This was the Pension Fund Benefit Concert featuring music by Tchaikovsky. The evening began with the lilting Polonaise from 'Eugen Onegin', continuing to the Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat monor op. 23, with Mr. Earl Wild as guest pianist, a master of his art. Mr. Wild moved through the allegro non troppo e molto maestoso to the allegro con fuoco with unbelievable control and clarity of note. Familiar and beautifully executed tones wafted out through the "shed" and across the lawns. With this as an example of Mr. Wild's artistry, it is no small wonder that he gave the world premiere of Paul Creston's Piano concerto in Paris, and later, the American premiere in Washington, or the world premiere of Marvin David Levy's First Piano concerto written especially for him, last December with the Chicago Symphony conducted by Georg Solti, among his several achievements.

Following the intermission, the Boston Pops Orchestra performed the Suite from the ballet, "Swan Lake" with Max Hobart as guest violinist and Ann Hobson as harpist, two other very accomplished artists. Again, familiar sounds with the opening harp arpeggios from the 'Opening Scene'. Swan Lake has been and will always be a favorite.

But the Boston Pops brought the audience to its feet for a fifteen minute ovation following the final piece of the announced program, the 1812 Overture solennelle. Goosepimpling excitement bestirred Pops fans as the cannons sounded during the last chimeringing bars of this magnificent piece.

Thundering applause brought the very popular and beloved Mr. Fiedler out time and again for bows with his musicians until he began again.

Two contemporary pieces, Bond Street and Look What They've Done To My Song followed, with spontaneous applause and to-the-music clapping participation of the audience. There's nothing quite like a full orchestration of pieces like Look What They've Done To My Song, especially treated in Pops fashion complete with foot-tapping and humming accompaniment by the musicians themselves. And, to round out the evening, Stars and Stripes Forever with cannon and fireworks. Again, long and deserved applause that continued until Mr. Fiedler returned to the stage and taking his violinist, Max Hobart, by the hand lead the orchestra off.

Mr. Fiedler is a show-man par excellence, and together with the Boston Pops, has become a household word, not only in their hometown of Boston, but throughout the world. This was not just a concert of favorite classics, in themselves things of beauty, but also a concert of feeling, power and fun, an alive-ness that makes music a universal language. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra and Tanglewood stretching out in all her tall-pine splendor, lady of the mist on this midsummer night.

Judy Sutherland

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 4 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Fiedler, Tchaikovsky Meet on Battlefield of Pops

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

WITH the weather as uncertain as it was shortly before concert time last night, the crowd attendance of 9,626 at the annual Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood was quite phenomenal. And Conductor Arthur Fiedler rewarded everyone with a thrilling evening.

It was an all-Tchaikovsky program ending with the rousing and exultant Overture Solonnelle, 1812. There were actual bombs bursting in air, cannons shooting in the distance and the tubular chimes on stage being pounded as if all the bells of Moscow were ringing to celebrate the great victory of Napoleon's retreat from the Battle of Borodino.

* * *

NO MATTER how attempts are made to disguise the Boston Symphony, by granting leave to the first-chair men, by bringing in a special guest conductor, by choosing a special program, it remains a top-shelf performance.

There was once an imperceptible line dividing the Janus-faced orchestra into two units, one facing upward and onward to the high-brow and dilletante, the other to the possibly less sophisticated concert-goer, but one who gets genuine pleasure out of music without too-deep scrutiny. Familiarity with the orchestra and expansion of literature has smudged this dividing line. Fiedler showed that he is aware of the change in the public's tastes and of its appreciation of higher standards.

* * *

THUS the program delved into the great piano concerto, the No. 1 in B flat which, among other famous riders, had carried Van Cliburn (and the United States) to artistic splendor and renown. Earl Wild was the soloist last night. This was his third appearance at Tanglewood this summer and each time he has enhanced his reputation as a man in complete command of the keyboard and in complete control of his high sense of taste.

The suite from the ballet "Swan Lake" gave violinist Max Hobart, cellist Martin Hoherman and harpist Ann Hobson opportunities to deserve the acclaim accorded them.

But the "1812" was the double climax of the evening. The powerful and melodramatic music is rather noisy and its programmatic character is fairly obvious, but all the better. It was originally planned to be performed by a gigantic orchestra assembled in a public square in Moscow. It begins with the solemn old Russian hymn "God, Preserve Thy People" and soon the encounter of the "Marseillaise" and "God Save the Czar" is harmonized by Tchaikovsky above an orchestral clamor rarely matched for sonority.

Fiedler began the evening with the Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin." He was playing encores from his old stock in trade long after Tchaikovsky had been abandoned. The concert was for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Whitestone

Fiedler and soloist Earl Wild performing for crowd of 9,626 at Tanglewood last night.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 1 1971

New England Newsclip

ELECTRONIC MUSIC

Earl Wild Likes It

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Sign of the times: Earl Wild has a crush on electronic music.

Fact 1: He is studying it at Pennsylvania State University.

Fact 2: He plans to install electronic sound generating and recording equipment worth $50,000 in his home at Palm Springs beginning in January.

Now, the thing that is so startling about this is that Wild has established himself as one of America's ranking performers of the grand romantic style in piano music, a style that is, on the surface, incompatible with contemporary electronic music.

For instance, Tuesday at 8.30 he will play the solo part of that most romantic among romantic concertos, Tchiakovsky's No. 1, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra at Tanglewood.

And not long ago he spent nearly an hour playing the flamboyant Liszt's piano music transcendentally for a Tanglewood weekend prelude audience.

What is a man who first became famous for his expertise with Gershwin's music doing delving into the weird other - world of electronic sound?

He likes it. He is almost hopped up about it.

But his enthusiasm should come as no surprise. . .especially to those who know him as a sensitive, receptive, open - minded musician.

He is internationally known as a pianist, but he is also a composer with several television music credits on his list (conductor, too, but he gave that up because it interferred with his piano playing).

And he has a high respect for the demands of electronic music.

"It's endless. It's like space," he says. "Up to now it's been a plaything. The Moog synthesizer can be a haven for the untalented. But no one should be allowed to work with it until he has the education for it. Otherwise all we'll get is more noise."

Will he install a Moog sound synthesizer, or the equivalent? "Oh, yes! Everything! I want the whole works. It can be something great."

His specific direction in electronic music is undecided, or, at least, secret. He has declined to indicate precisely how he plans to compose with the new equipment, pointing out that there are so many directions available he doesn't know yet how the music will lead him.

He indicated he has a few specific ideas that he doesn't want to reveal for fear someone might steal them before he has time to use them.

But then he says, "Children's things could be so marvelous (electronically) — with a narrator — illustrated stories." But that's all he'll say about that.

And he talks about the architecture of music. "Tonality doesn't matter any more. Sound is nothing without organization. It has to have size, shape, boundaries. Everyone's looking for new shapes, new forms. Without form (in music) you just fly around like a dead Sputnik."

Wild isn't leaping into this electronic thing wildly, though. He has a lot of work to do before the equipment is installed.

He likes to play about 30 concerts a year, and he has to practice daily, but not to keep his fingers limber. "The mind gets out of practice," he says, "not the fingers. Things go. . .they get fuzzy. The interpretation goes."

He says he likes to know a year in advance what he is going to play at concerts so that he can lean it so thoroughly he has no worries about how he will play it, that is, interpretively.

He has no worries about whether he can play it, although learning new music is difficult for him. Currently he is laboriously studying a capriccio and a concerto by Stravinsky and Schoenberg's concerto.

"I'm slow," he says. "It's like swimming through marble. I have to chisel each note." Learning to play a piece in your living room is one thing, he says. "When you're standing in the wings, it's another matter."

So what with practicing and touring and learning new music, his leap into the electronic mysteries will be postponed several months.

In the meantime he cherishes the dream that electronic sound will replace the bland, piped - in music that invades supermarkets and department stores.

"It is a curse," he says. "It started when they discovered that factory workers work faster when they are listening to Hungarian waltzes. Pretty soon everyone will have to travel with a sound jammer so he can get away from it."

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 38,589

JUN 30 1971

EARL WILD

Pianist Wild To Give Recital July 7 At U-M

Earl Wild, pianist in the forefront of today's Romantic Revival, will make his first Ann Arbor appearance at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, July 7, when he opens the eighth annual Summer Series presented at the University by the University Musical Society.

This will be the first of four piano recitals this summer. Wild will be followed by John Ogden on July 15, Philippe Entremont on July 20 and Garrick Ohlsson on July 28.

Wild's program in Rackham Auditorium will include Variations in G on a Theme by Gluck by Mozart; Piano Pieces, Op. 76 by Brahms; Andante spianato and Polonaise, Op. 22 by Chopin, and compositions by Liszt.

Following his performance, Wild will go to Tanglewood to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Born in Pittsburgh, Wild has performed with major symphony orchestras all over the world, including those in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit, London, Paris, Monte Carlo and Trieste.

He has participated in many premieres. In Paris he was soloist in the world premiere performance of Paul Creston's Piano Concerto, later giving the work's American premiere in Washington. Wild was the first artist ever to give a piano recital on television, and he was the pianist in the American premiere of Shostakovich's Piano Trio in E minor.

In December 1970 he premiered Marvin David Levy's first Piano Concerto, a work especially written for him, with the Chicago Symphony under Georg Solti.

Wild is also a successful composer. His Easter oratorio, "Revelations," commissioned by the American Broadcasting Company, was presented on that network in 1962 and again in 1964 with Wild conducting the performances. He has also composed ballet, orchestral and incidental music for several different media.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755

JUN 28 1971

Silverstein Popular Star Of Festival

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

SARASOTA — This is the story of a pro . . . named Joe.

He probably wouldn't want this written, judging by his quiet, unassuming musical manner at the seventh annual New College Summer Music Festival concerts here at Van Wezel Hall Friday and Saturday nights.

But that's what makes him a pro . . . along with his extraordinarily superior musicianship.

Violinist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty chairman at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, has become the leading musical light of this excellent June Florida festival . . . not only for this writer but for the entire festival audience of 1,000 or more this past weekend. And they let him know it — not only on Friday night when he was featured soloist, but again on Saturday night when he was festival orchestra concertmaster.

SATURDAY Silverstein wasn't to be the star. He walked quietly onstage with the rest of the orchestra . . . no late, special entrance as has become the style with area orchestras. But as he emerged, applause spread across the auditorium. And after intermission when Silverstein again took his first chair voilin position, there was more applause plus recognition from his orchestra of students and faculty.

Silverstein hasn't achieved this respect with the obvious stage antics of one of his fellow artist faculty members, or by being a colorful character and mod dresser, or by pushing himself. He has gained this tremendous following because he's a consistently fine and genuine musician, and proves it in teaching, leading a violin section, blending in top chamber ensembles or playing a solo — as he did so eloquently Friday night.

BENDING and swaying with the lilt of the music, no need of a score, often humming orchestral sections, knitting his dark brows over serious, dark eyes, Silverstein transformed Bruch's deeply moving and emotional "Scottish Fantasy" into an almost religious experience — intense, sweet, spirit-soothing. Heads shook in disbelief at his beautiful, high tones . . . runs as clear as brook water . . . phrasing as delicate as a breath . . . timing and facility transcending mere notation. Eyes brimmed over during the lovely third movement 'song.' So it was no surprise when the entire audience jumped to its feet the moment Silverstein finished playing — four curtain calls, screams of 'more,' the orchestra stomping its feet. In Silverstein they had a musical hero.

The youthful festival orchestra, composed of some 100 music students from the country's major conservatories and symphony orchestras, is no amateur group either. It was another highlight of the closing weekend. Their excellence in the Mendelssohn "Symphony No. 4" and overtures by Schubert and Beethoven brought to mind Leopold Stokowski's successful young American Symphony and also made you wonder if orchestra managers had thought to come here to do some scouting.

PIANIST Leonid Hambro, in his overly-affected way, drew his share of appaluse for an exciting performance of Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3." His humor and whimsy were ideal and appropriate to the Prokofiev, but his great bird-like arm movements and terrible facial grimaces added little to the musical effectiveness or technical facility.

MUSIC REVIEW

The only really unfortunate event of the weekend was the performance by violist Sir William Primrose, 68, in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Suffice it to say the once great soloist should not be doing solo work now. His intonation and tone production were totally uncontrolled and often bad. Reports are that his hearing is impaired, which, if true, should dictate a resolve to stay offstage.

New College Summer Music Festival, Van Wezel Hall, Sarasota. Final concerts: June 25-26, 1971; 8:30 p.m. Guest soloists — violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianist Leonid Hambro, violist William Primrose; Festival Orchestra, conducted by festival founder-director Paul Wolfe. Programs: Friday — Overture to Rosamunde (Schubert), Scottish Fantasy (Brunch), Symphony No. 4 in A Major, Op. 90, Italian (Mendelssohn); Saturday — Overture to Fidelio, Op. 72 (Beethoven), Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Major (Prokofiev), Symphony No. 3, Op. 16, Harold in Italy (Berlioz).

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 1 1971

New England Newsclip

ELECTRONIC MUSIC

Earl Wild Likes It

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Sign of the times: Earl Wild has a crush on electronic music.

Fact 1: He is studying it at Pennsylvania State University.

Fact 2: He plans to install electronic sound generating and recording equipment worth $50,000 in his home at Palm Springs beginning in January.

Now, the thing that is so startling about this is that Wild has established himself as one of America's ranking performers of the grand romantic style in piano music, a style that is, on the surface, incompatible with contemporary electronic music.

For instance, Tuesday at 8.30 he will play the solo part of that most romantic among romantic concertos, Tchiakovsky's No. 1, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orchestra at Tanglewood.

And not long ago he spent nearly an hour playing the flamboyant Liszt's piano music transcendentally for a Tanglewood weekend prelude audience.

What is a man who first became famous for his expertise with Gershwin's music doing delving into the weird other - world of electronic sound?

He likes it. He is almost hopped up about it.

But his enthusiasm should come as no surprise. . .especially to those who know him as a sensitive, receptive, open - minded musician.

He is internationally known as a pianist, but he is also a composer with several television music credits on his list (conductor, too, but he gave that up because it interferred with his piano playing).

And he has a high respect for the demands of electronic music.

"It's endless. It's like space," he says. "Up to now it's been a plaything. The Moog synthesizer can be a haven for the untalented. But no one should be allowed to work with it until he has the education for it. Otherwise all we'll get is more noise."

Will he install a Moog sound synthesizer, or the equivalent? "Oh, yes! Everything! I want the whole works. It can be something great."

His specific direction in electronic music is undecided, or, at least, secret. He has declined to indicate precisely how he plans to compose with the new equipment, pointing out that there are so many directions available he doesn't know yet how the music will lead him.

He indicated he has a few specific ideas that he doesn't want to reveal for fear someone might steal them before he has time to use them.

But then he says, "Children's things could be so marvelous (electronically) — with a narrator — illustrated stories." But that's all he'll say about that.

And he talks about the architecture of music. "Tonality doesn't matter any more. Sound is nothing without organization. It has to have size, shape, boundaries. Everyone's looking for new shapes, new forms. Without form (in music) you just fly around like a dead Sputnik."

Wild isn't leaping into this electronic thing wildly, though. He has a lot of work to do before the equipment is installed.

He likes to play about 30 concerts a year, and he has to practice daily, but not to keep his fingers limber. "The mind gets out of practice," he says, "not the fingers. Things go. . .they get fuzzy. The interpretation goes."

He says he likes to know a year in advance what he is going to play at concerts so that he can lean it so thoroughly he has no worries about how he will play it, that is, interpretively.

He has no worries about whether he can play it, although learning new music is difficult for him. Currently he is laboriously studying a capriccio and a concerto by Stravinsky and Schoenberg's concerto.

"I'm slow," he says. "It's like swimming through marble. I have to chisel each note." Learning to play a piece in your living room is one thing, he says. "When you're standing in the wings, it's another matter."

So what with practicing and touring and learning new music, his leap into the electronic mysteries will be postponed several months.

In the meantime he cherishes the dream that electronic sound will replace the bland, piped - in music that invades supermarkets and department stores.

"It is a curse," he says. "It started when they discovered that factory workers work faster when they are listening to Hungarian waltzes. Pretty soon everyone will have to travel with a sound jammer so he can get away from it."

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D 33,589

JUN 30 1971

EARL WILD

Pianist Wild To Give Recital July 7 At U-M

Earl Wild, pianist in the forefront of today's Romantic Revival, will make his first Ann Arbor appearance at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, July 7, when he opens the eighth annual Summer Series presented at the University by the University Musical Society.

This will be the first of four piano recitals this summer. Wild will be followed by John Ogden on July 15, Philippe Entremont on July 20 and Garrick Ohlsson on July 28.

Wild's program in Rackham Auditorium will include Variations in G on a Theme by Gluck by Mozart; Piano Pieces, Op. 76 by Brahms; Andante spianato and Polonaise, Op. 22 by Chopin, and compositions by Liszt.

Following his performance, Wild will go to Tanglewood to perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Born in Pittsburgh, Wild has performed with major symphony orchestras all over the world, including those in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit, London, Paris, Monte Carlo and Trieste.

He has participated in many premieres. In Paris he was soloist in the world premiere performance of Paul Creston's Piano Concerto, later giving the work's American premiere in Washington. Wild was the first artist ever to give a piano recital on television, and he was the pianist in the American premiere of Shostakovich's Piano Trio in E minor.

In December 1970 he premiered Marvin David Levy's first Piano Concerto, a work especially written for him, with the Chicago Symphony under Georg Solti.

Wild is also a successful composer. His Easter oratorio, "Revelations," commissioned by the American Broadcasting Company, was presented on that network in 1962 and again in 1964 with Wild conducting the performances. He has also composed ballet, orchestral and incidental music for several different media.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 105,056 SUN. 131,755

JUN 28 1971

Silverstein Popular Star Of Festival

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

SARASOTA — This is the story of a pro . . . named Joe.

He probably wouldn't want this written, judging by his quiet, unassuming musical manner at the seventh annual New College Summer Music Festival concerts here at Van Wezel Hall Friday and Saturday nights.

But that's what makes him a pro . . . along with his extraordinarily superior musicianship.

Violinist Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty chairman at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, has become the leading musical light of this excellent June Florida festival . . . not only for this writer but for the entire festival audience of 1,000 or more this past weekend. And they let him know it — not only on Friday night when he was featured soloist, but again on Saturday night when he was festival orchestra concertmaster.

SATURDAY Silverstein wasn't to be the star. He walked quietly onstage with the rest of the orchestra . . . no late, special entrance as has become the style with area orchestras. But as he emerged, applause spread across the auditorium. And after intermission when Silverstein again took his first chair voilin position, there was more applause plus recognition from his orchestra of students and faculty.

Silverstein hasn't achieved this respect with the obvious stage antics of one of his fellow artist faculty members, or by being a colorful character and mod dresser, or by pushing himself. He has gained this tremendous following because he's a consistently fine and genuine musician, and proves it in teaching, leading a violin section, blending in top chamber ensembles or playing a solo — as he did so eloquently Friday night.

BENDING and swaying with the lilt of the music, no need of a score, often humming orchestral sections, knitting his dark brows over serious, dark eyes, Silverstein transformed Bruch's deeply moving and emotional "Scottish Fantasy" into an almost religious experience — intense, sweet, spirit-soothing. Heads shook in disbelief at his beautiful, high tones . . . runs as clear as brook water . . . phrasing as delicate as a breath . . . timing and facility transcending mere notation. Eyes brimmed over during the lovely third movement 'song.' So it was no surprise when the entire audience jumped to its feet the moment Silverstein finished playing — four curtain calls, screams of 'more,' the orchestra stomping its feet. In Silverstein they had a musical hero.

The youthful festival orchestra, composed of some 100 music students from the country's major conservatories and symphony orchestras, is no amateur group either. It was another highlight of the closing weekend. Their excellence in the Mendelssohn "Symphony No. 4" and overtures by Schubert and Beethoven brought to mind Leopold Stokowski's successful young American Symphony and also made you wonder if orchestra managers had thought to come here to do some scouting.

PIANIST Leonid Hambro, in his overly-affected way, drew his share of appaluse for an exciting performance of Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3." His humor and whimsy were ideal and appropriate to the Prokofiev, but his great bird-like arm movements and terrible facial grimaces added little to the musical effectiveness or technical facility.

MUSIC REVIEW

The only really unfortunate event of the weekend was the performance by violist Sir William Primrose, 68, in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Suffice it to say the once great soloist should not be doing solo work now. His intonation and tone production were totally uncontrolled and often bad. Reports are that his hearing is impaired, which, if true, should dictate a resolve to stay offstage.

New College Summer Music Festival, Van Wezel Hall, Sarasota. Final concerts: June 25-26, 1971; 8:30 p.m. Guest soloists — violinist Joseph Silverstein, pianist Leonid Hambro, violist William Primrose; Festival Orchestra, conducted by festival founder-director Paul Wolfe. Programs: Friday — Overture to Rosamunde (Schubert), Scottish Fantasy (Bruch), Symphony No. 4 in A Major, Op. 90, Italian (Mendelssohn); Saturday — Overture to Fidelio, Op. 72 (Beethoven), Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Major (Prokofiev), Symphony No. 3, Op. 16, Harold in Italy (Berlioz).

150

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 137,000

AUG 29 1971

New England Newsclip

Rising Star In Musical Firmament

Boston Symphony

By RENA FRUCHTER

LENOX, Mass. — Less than three years ago, a young German pianist wandered into the Royal Festival Hall in London, and created quite a storm with his performance of the Hans Werner Henze Concerto, playing magnificently and from memory three-quarters of an hour of music which most musicians agreed was impossible to play and even harder to memorize.

There followed other triumphs. And there were incredible recordings with Von Karajan conducting the Berlin Philharmonic. Then there was a successful American tour—or rather, there have been three extensive tours a year for the past three years.

There is a large and ardent following among musicians, who have begun to ask why the name Christoph Eschenbach is not a household word among the concertgoers.

But people seem to be learning the truth slowly, and going home after a concert spreading the fact, not the opinion, that the 31-year-old artist is a man of musical genius and sensitivity.

I was present at the London premiere of the Henze Concerto three years ago. At that time Eschenbach was hesitant and self-conscious about speaking in English.

Now he speaks with greater confidence, but with the same modesty and dedication which were his most prominent features then.

U.S. Orchestras Fantastic

Asked about his impressions of the United States, Eschenbach replied, "I like very much playing in the United States because, first of all, the orchestras are so fantastic. You have not these kinds of orchestras in Europe, except perhaps the Berlin Philharmonic. But these orchestras—like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Chicago, and Cleveland, are really outstanding and to play with them is the most fun.

"And these summer places—especially Tanglewood. Such a relaxed and good and creative atmosphere. The people who come here come really for music—they come relaxed, and they are more open.

"I like very much the American character which takes a problem in a not so tense a way, and tries to solve it quietly and intelligently."

Eschenbach's slow rise to fame can be attributed to several factors. He was not launched by one of the major international competitions. Although fully capable of doing so, he does not perform the repertoire which would give him popular appeal. And his image is not in any way a flashy one. He has a boyish charm, and an informal, open manner of performing and speaking.

He is desperately concerned with breaking down the formal boundaries which separate performer from audience, and seriously trying to create a new type of audience awareness. Performing an evening recital in casual white slacks and a red shirt may be just one symbol of his rebellion against tradition—one way of feeling closer to an audience.

"It is necessary to put away any routine listening: also to put away the feeling of listening to music like a pudding or cake—like eating a dessert, something nice and sweet and pleasant.

"Because music is something much more serious . . . much more important and much more demanding."

This was the reason, he explained, that he chose to perform the Beethoven

See ESCHENBACH Page 6D

German pianist Christoph Eschenbach.

(Continued From Page 1D)

Sonata, Op. 106 ('Hammerklavier') for a Friday evening recital at Tanglewod.

Shocked Reaction

"I know that people come for the main concert at 9 o'clock, and they just want to hear 'some music' at 7. And so I confront them with a piece like that. And of course the reaction is a little shocked, I think, and for me that is positive. Because it shows people how serious music is—not just a nice pleasantry."

Speaking about the 'Hammerklavier' Sonata, Eschenbach added, "This music is without any cliches, and you have so much to think about.

"But it is a work that takes years. I worked on it years ago, and I didn't play it . . . Then I worked on it again, and I still didn't dare play it. Then I left it for years, and now I play it."

Trying to consider the position of the audience, Eschenbach thought for a long time, and replied, "The term of 'understanding' in relation to music is a very complicated and complex thing. I think people have to be open. Just be open and listen to the music, and try to discover the contents — emotionally and in every aspect.

"You can relate every note, every sound, and the degree of intensity of the musical phrase. If you are open, you can relate this to your own life and your own emotion and your own intensity. And that, I think, is the right manner to listen to music—not to discover when the second theme comes or when the violins enter. That is only superficial and is not necessary.

Eschenbach had a fairly conventional education background, studying with Eliza Hansen in Hamburg, and studying later in Cologne; and he has performed with the major orchestras in Europe and North America. But his artistry is of a highly original breed.

Sitting on the lawn outside the Tanglewood Shed and examining one by one the blades of grass, Eschenbach looked a little dismayed as he spoke about the commercial way in which music is treated both here and in Europe. But his generation, he feels, is trying to eliminate the problem by "negotiating." "We try to make music even more intensely, so that the commercial aspect loses its small value."

Social Idealist

Eschenbach is a slight, soft-spoken man, a musical and social idealist. Regarding his image as a performer, Eschenbach replied, "I don't know what image I have . . . I don't know because the image I have of myself changes every day. I'm very sensible to impressions I have, so I change.

"For me it's right to live in the present, not to live in the future, or to plan for the future, or to make one's 'image' for the future, or to live on the reserve of an image which you have had in the past.

Believing strongly in serious musical analysis, Eschenbach performs "first, of course, for the pleasure I have with music. Pleasure is not the right word—I mean the necessity that I feel to make music.

"Music has become my blood of life, my essence of life, and without music I would be like without food, without something important.

"And then, of course, I want other people to share that feeling. It's very simple. It's just like that.

"Because I think music opens up many aspects of life. It sweeps away the brutality that is caused by non-communication and misunderstanding."

Speaking of his recordings with Von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic, Eschenbach also mentioned that he has recently recorded all the Mozart sonatas for Deutsche Grammophon, but has only slowly come to appreciate that medium.

"At first I hated it because of this certain coldness, but I don't find that any more. It's for me like a very strong lesson I give to myself.

"It's like performance. At first it is a little strange . . . the text attacks you. It wants to attack you. You feel a little strange and then perhaps you realize—'That's what I want!' "

A rehearsal of the First Beethoven Concerto was just beginning, and Eschenbach apologized and excused himself.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755
JUN 14 1971

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 13,000
APR 1971 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
APR 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Musicians Match Talents

Jules Eskin, principal cellist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, demonstrates a musical point in a Festival master class.

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

SARASOTA — Brahms, John Barrows, New College String Quartet, priceless artistry. That, oversimplified, is the order of superlatives heard during the first two nights of concerts here at Van Wezel Hall (Friday and Saturday) of the seventh annual New College Summer Music Festival.

And 900 devotees came both nights to cheer, yell bravo, stand for Brahms, admire all the artist performers.

This festival is a major one — not only in Florida, but in the southeast and the U.S. This festival is characterized by consistent excellence — in performance, instruction, attendance. This festival is unusual — primarily all chamber music, stressing the small ensemble, the person-to-person contact between great teacher and serious students.

MUSIC REVIEW

THIS IS THE special joy of chamber music — highly personal, intimate contact from composer to performer to listener, if the performance is of top quality. The New College Festival is of star quality.

Some 100 students from the country's major music conservatories and schools of music once again have trekked to Sarasota to match talents and wits with such major faculty-performers as violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin (concertmaster and principal cellist, respectively, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra), French hornist John Barrows (Casals Festival, Wisconsin and Arizona universities), pianist Leonid Hambro (formerly New York Philhar-

(See MUSIC FESTIVAL, 8-D)

Music Festival

From 1-D

monic and Victor Borge's foil), oboist Robert Bloom and violist William Primrose (formerly NBC Symphony under Toscanini). Flutist Julius Baker, whom Time Magazine has ranked "among the great flute players of all time," back for his sixth consecutive season, sums up the musical-personal experience: "I don't treat these young musicians as students but rather as my colleagues." And more outstanding faculty will arrive during the next two weeks for classes and the four remaining concerts.

BRAHMS and Barrows were the stars Saturday night. Brahms' "Trio in B Major, Op. 8," in superb performances by Silverstein, Eskin and Hambro, touched everyone receptive to love and warmth and beauty. The three highly sensitive and expressive performers brought forth Brahms' masterful writing with their exquisite interpretation and ensemble. They deserved every bravo, every person who jumped to his feet applauding, four and five curtain calls which called them back onstage time after time. This was one of those glorious experiences which completely break down barriers and expose true depth of feelings.

"It was magnificent," St. Petersburg pianist Louis Esposito exclaimed. "We (Esposito Trio) have played this Brahms several times, but not until you hear it played like this do you realize just how difficult it is. That third movement was heavenly. And the cellist (Eskin) is an outstanding ensemble player."

French hornist Barrows was the other recipient of special praise Saturday for his featured performance in the Mozart "Quintet in E-flat Major, K. 407." Barrows, not well last season, is back in the excellent musical form which characterized his performances in earlier festivals — Saturday his rich, mellow, consistently controlled tone soared clearly and beautifully in runs or scales or leaps or trills or sustained tones. And all done with quiet modesty and the greatest of ease.

SARASOTA'S superb New College String Quartet — violinists Paul Wolfe (festival founder and director) and Anita Brooker, violist Robert Vernon, cellist Christopher von Baeyer — proved their equality of excellence Friday night in a vigorous and vital performance of the lovely Schumann "Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 44," with pianist Hambro. In fact, youthful violist Vernon, once a festival student himself, captured the admiration of audiences with his exciting viola work both evenings.

New College Summer Music Festival, Van Wezel Hall, Sarasota; June 11-12, 1971, 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts June 18-19, 25-26. Tickets $3.50. Works performed: Concerto in A Minor (Telemann), Trio in C Minor, Op. 9, No. 3 (Beethoven), Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 44 (Schumann), Trio Sonata in G Major (Bach), Serenade (Donovan), Quintet in E-flat Major, K. 407 (Mozart), Trio in B Major, Op. 8 (Brahms).

Close-Up

A Way of Life for any Age

By Dan Webster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

A violinist learns the craft of his art and embarks on a career now the same way he did 50 years ago. He plays the same repertory in the same cities. Is it a life for a young man?

Pinchas Zukerman answers strongly in the affirmative. The shaggy-haired, 22-year-old Israeli violinist, who will be heard as a guest artist with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this summer, compares what he had hoped for in music with what he has found and says, "It's much, much more than I expected."

Zukerman was last in this country last summer on a route which included a stop in New York.

Building Anew

"The wonderful thing about playing is that you meet such wonderful people everywhere you go. And music is something you recreate every day. It's not a case of playing the same piece over and over and getting bored. You see, the piece is new each time you play it.

"I think Artur Rubinstein is the example here. He has been playing the repertory all these years, but you hear his excitement in playing each piece again. If music is boring after you've played a piece five times, it's time to get out of the business."

Zukerman has been in the business about as long as most musicians his age. He started violin at seven in Tel Aviv, and shifted to Juilliard School at 13. He won the Leventritt Prize four years ago and began a soloist's career with the 1711 Stradivarius lent him by a Washington collector.

He brought to that early career a broader base of musical experience than many of his generation. He has, for instance, recorded all the Beethoven trios with Daniel Barenboim, with whom he will appear Aug. 1 at Tanglewood (his first appearance there will be July 17), in a way that left Barenboim openmouthed. Zukerman knew all of them by heart. And when they went on to other trios, sonatas and quartets with piano, he knew all of them from memory too.

Tuning In

"Chamber music is very much second nature to me. My father is a violinist and knows the importance of listening to other players. After only three months of study, I was playing duets with my father, you see.

"At 13, when I came to this country, I knew 90 per cent of the violin chamber music repertory — not the contemporary works that are not played all the time — but the standard repertory. I think I know nearly all of it now.

"Chamber music was very important to me as a student, but even moreso now. You see, I have the habit of listening to the orchestral players to see what they have to give, and I play with them," he says.

His position would seem to circumvent the conductor, and Zukerman has some ideas about the podium, too.

"Oh, I have no ambitions to do the Bruckner symphonies, when I conduct, but I am going to tour with the English Chamber Orchestra. I'll be more a leader than a conductor, since I'll be playing the Mozart concertos and conducting at the same time.

Synchronized Actions

"Playing and leading brings you closer to the players. This is about ideal for Mozart and for Bach. We're going to record the Bach concertos this way."

Zukerman has spoken about standard repertory until now, and he sounds sad when he looks at contemporary music. "I'm constantly looking," he says. "Everybody tells me there's so much music, but where is it? I've done some Israeli stuff and I've heard some English things. Last fall in London, he played a lot of Webern, including the saxophone quartet, in fact nearly all of his works. "It's hard, but not that hard and I find it very intellectual and very satisfying to play.

"For the most part, I am looking for things that are not played often — like the Nielsen Concerto, Elgar, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Sophr and Bruch. They are not played often and have some good things in them.

"However, this doesn't mean I'm discouraged or that I'm tired of the standard repertory or that I'm going to give up playing for conducting. The fiddle is too dear to me for any of that," he says.

PINCHAS ZUKERMAN: he likes it

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755
JUN 14 1971

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 13,000
APR 1971 New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
APR 13 1971 New England Newsclip

Musicians Match Talents

Jules Eskin, principal cellist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, demonstrates a musical point in a Festival master class.

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

SARASOTA — Brahms, John Barrows, New College String Quartet, priceless artistry. That, oversimplified, is the order of superlatives heard during the first two nights of concerts here at Van Wezel Hall (Friday and Saturday) of the seventh annual New College Summer Music Festival.

And 900 devotees came both nights to cheer, yell bravo, stand for Brahms, admire all the artist performers.

This festival is a major one — not only in Florida, but in the southeast and the U.S. This festival is characterized by consistent excellence — in performance, instruction, attendance. This festival is unusual — primarily all chamber music, stressing the small ensemble, the person-to-person contact between great teacher and serious students.

MUSIC REVIEW

THIS IS THE special joy of chamber music — highly personal, intimate contact from composer to performer to listener, if the performance is of top quality. The New College Festival is of star quality.

Some 100 students from the country's major music conservatories and schools of music once again have trekked to Sarasota to match talents and wits with such major faculty-performers as violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin (concertmaster and principal cellist, respectively, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra), French hornist John Barrows (Casals Festival, Wisconsin and Arizona universities), pianist Leonid Hambro (formerly New York Philhar-

(See MUSIC FESTIVAL, 8-D)

Music Festival

From 1-D

monic and Victor Borge's foil), oboist Robert Bloom and violist William Primrose (formerly NBC Symphony under Toscanini). Flutist Julius Baker, whom Time Magazine has ranked "among the great flute players of all time," back for his sixth consecutive season, sums up the musical-personal experience: "I don't treat these young musicians as students but rather as my colleagues." And more outstanding faculty will arrive during the next two weeks for classes and the four remaining concerts.

BRAHMS and Barrows were the stars Saturday night. Brahms' "Trio in B Major, Op. 8," in superb performances by Silverstein, Eskin and Hambro, touched everyone receptive to love and warmth and beauty. The three highly sensitive and expressive performers brought forth Brahms' masterful writing with their exquisite interpretation and ensemble. They deserved every bravo, every person who jumped to his feet applauding, four and five curtain calls which called them back onstage time after time. This was one of those glorious experiences which completely break down barriers and expose true depth of feelings.

"It was magnificent," St. Petersburg pianist Louis Esposito exclaimed. "We (Esposito Trio) have played this Brahms several times, but not until you hear it played like this do you realize just how difficult it is. That third movement was heavenly. And the cellist (Eskin) is an outstanding ensemble player."

French hornist Barrows was the other recipient of special praise Saturday for his featured performance in the Mozart "Quintet in E-flat Major, K. 407." Barrows, not well last season, is back in the excellent musical form which characterized his performances in earlier festivals — Saturday his rich, mellow, consistently controlled tone soared clearly and beautifully in runs or scales or leaps or trills or sustained tones. And all done with quiet modesty and the greatest of ease.

SARASOTA'S superb New College String Quartet — violinists Paul Wolfe (festival founder and director) and Anita Brooker, violist Robert Vernon, cellist Christopher von Baeyer — proved their equality of excellence Friday night in a vigorous and vital performance of the lovely Schumann "Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 44," with pianist Hambro. In fact, youthful violist Vernon, once a festival student himself, captured the admiration of audiences with his exciting viola work both evenings.

New College Summer Music Festival, Van Wezel Hall, Sarasota; June 11-12, 1971, 8:30 p.m. Additional concerts June 18-19, 25-26. Tickets $3.50. Works performed: Concerto in A Minor (Telemann), Trio in C Minor, Op. 9, No. 3 (Beethoven), Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 44 (Schumann), Trio Sonata in G Major (Bach), Serenade (Donovan), Quintet in E-flat Major, K. 407 (Mozart), Trio in B Major, Op. 8 (Brahms).

Close-Up

A Way of Life for any Age

By Dan Webster
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

A violinist learns the craft of his art and embarks on a career now the same way he did 50 years ago. He plays the same repertory in the same cities. Is it a life for a young man?

Pinchas Zukerman answers strongly in the affirmative. The shaggy-haired, 22-year-old Israeli violinist, who will be heard as a guest artist with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this summer, compares what he had hoped for in music with what he has found and says, "It's much, much more than I expected."

Zukerman was last in this country last summer on a route which included a stop in New York.

Building Anew

"The wonderful thing about playing is that you meet such wonderful people everywhere you go. And music is something you recreate every day. It's not a case of playing the same piece over and over and getting bored. You see, the piece is new each time you play it.

"I think Artur Rubinstein is the example here. He has been playing the repertory all these years, but you hear his excitement in playing each piece again. If music is boring after you've played a piece five times, it's time to get out of the business."

Zukerman has been in the business about as long as most musicians his age. He started violin at seven in Tel Aviv, and shifted to Juilliard School at 13. He won the Leventritt Prize four years ago and began a soloist's career with the 1711 Stradivarius lent him by a Washington collector.

He brought to that early career a broader base of musical experience than many of his generation. He has, for instance, recorded all the Beethoven trios with Daniel Barenboim, with whom he will appear Aug. 1 at Tanglewood (his first appearance there will be July 17), in a way that left Barenboim openmouthed. Zukerman knew all of them by heart. And when they went on to other trios, sonatas and quartets with piano, he knew all of them from memory too.

Tuning In

"Chamber music is very much second nature to me. My father is a violinist and knows the importance of listening to other players. After only three months of study, I was playing duets with my father, you see.

"At 13, when I came to this country, I knew 90 per cent of the violin chamber music repertory — not the contemporary works that are not played all the time — but the standard repertory. I think I know nearly all of it now.

"Chamber music was very important to me as a student, but even moreso now. You see, I have the habit of listening to the orchestral players to see what they have to give, and I play with them," he says.

His position would seem to circumvent the conductor, and Zukerman has some ideas about the podium, too.

"Oh, I have no ambitions to do the Bruckner symphonies, when I conduct, but I am going to tour with the English Chamber Orchestra. I'll be more a leader than a conductor, since I'll be playing the Mozart concertos and conducting at the same time.

Synchronized Actions

"Playing and leading brings you closer to the players. This is about ideal for Mozart and for Bach. We're going to record the Bach concertos this way."

Zukerman has spoken about standard repertory until now, and he sounds sad when he looks at contemporary music. "I'm constantly looking," he says. "Everybody tells me there's so much music, but where is it? I've done some Israeli stuff and I've heard some English things. Last fall in London, he played a lot of Webern, including the saxophone quartet, in fact nearly all of his works. "It's hard, but not that hard and I find it very intellectual and very satisfying to play.

"For the most part, I am looking for things that are not played often — like the Nielsen Concerto, Elgar, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski, Sophr and Bruch. They are not played often and have some good things in them.

"However, this doesn't mean I'm discouraged or that I'm tired of the standard repertory or that I'm going to give up playing for conducting. The fiddle is too dear to me for any of that," he says.

PINCHAS ZUKERMAN: he likes it

152

TIMES (SUNDAY)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
1,407,549

AUG 15 1971

New England Newsclip

They're Having Third Thoughts About Alexis Weissenberg

By ROSEMARIE TAURIS

AT a recent television show in Paris, a 12-year-old girl rose from the audience and asked pianist Alexis Weissenberg, "How does it feel to be important?" "I don't know," he answered, somewhat taken aback. "Well, aren't you important?" she insisted. "I can only tell you," he replied, "while I am working I have to feel important, otherwise I would not be able to go on."

"I think it is true," he said, as he related the incident in a Manhattan hotel room during a quick stopover. "To be convincing, you must be convinced of what you are doing, and by that point alone you are important. It's part of the energy you have to fabricate for a performance. But if afterwards, when you leave the stage, you still feel important, then maybe you should be slapped."

This blend of detachment, cool self-appraisal and humor is characteristic of Alexis Weissenberg. He has known quick success and quicker failure. Meteoric rise and oblivion. Tense and mercurial, he burst on the scene at the age of 18 in a blaze of critical acclaim, had a flickering career as Sigi Weissenberg, and vanished from the concert circuit 10 years later. Now, at 42, Weissenberg is riding the crest of a spectacular comeback. A man of his time, he looks more like a Hell's Angel than a pianist in his mod, tight hip-huggers, wide leather belt, black open-necked cotton shirt, and blue-black leather jacket.

With 90 concerts scheduled on three continents next season, 15 record albums in U.S. catalogues (several more in Europe), three musical television films (one, "Petrouchka," a prize-winning NET favorite), and a weekly radio interview program on WNCN beginning in October—all accomplished within less than four years—Weissenberg is in the top rank of his profession. Today he is due to fly in from a Salzburg festival appearance. Next Friday he plays a "Weekend Prelude" recital at Tanglewood where, the night after, he performs the Ravel Piano Concerto in G with the Boston Symphony under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas. Four days later, he joins Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic in St. Moritz, Switzerland.

"I like the fast tempo of this career," he admits. "But as a way of life it is completely unconvincing and crazy. I don't believe in the impersonal routine of checking in and out of hotel rooms, packing suitcases, and giving the key back. But if you need music—and it's not even a matter of love, music is in you, you are not in it—then performing, with that extra energy a concert can give you, is completely necessary. And I think that joy justifies everything else."

*

Weissenberg travels all over Europe with his own Hamburg Steinway concert grand, Phenomenon II. "It is much better known to customs officials than I am," he says proudly. "Most people hesitate to ask me why I call him Phenomenon II. Maybe they think I consider myself Phenomenon I? But there is no Phenomenon I." Like all pianists, he has a very personal relationship with the instrument. "I have great respect for him, and I treat him like a pharaoh."

Him?

"Oh yes. A piano is definitely not a she. I think a piano has the potential of a bull, and to dominate it is one of the most exciting things for a pianist. It's especially exhilarating when there is a David-Goliath feeling about it. Have you ever noticed when Horowitz sits at the piano that there is something magical happening? You can see it, not only hear it: He grows, and the piano reduces. He is oversize suddenly. And that, of course, is the art of a great pianist." Does Weissenberg, wiry and slight at 5 feet, 6 inches and 135 pounds, ever feel larger than life? "Yes. In order to project, I think it is necessary to be oversize, in a way."

Born in Sofia, Bulgaria, Alexis Sigismund Weissenberg started piano lessons at the age of 3. "All anecdotes are the same," he says rather impatiently. "We all seem to be geniuses and are taught by our mothers." But Sigi ("a kiddie name" he has tried to live down ever since) soon revealed a phenomenal facility, became the bane of his classmates, the pet pupil of Bulgaria's foremost composer, Pantcho Vladigeroff, and gave public recitals in his early teens. In 1945, during the Soviet occupation, he and his mother left Bulgaria, were stopped at the Turkish border, imprisoned, escaped six months later, and fled to Israel. There he played his first concert with an orchestra. Before the year was out, he had completed a concert tour of South Africa.

*

He was 16 when his mother (his parents were divorced) decided that "if I had to develop an individuality as an artist, I would certainly first have to develop as a human being." An unlikely Jewish Mother, she sent her son to the United States alone. "She always said that as soon as society decides that a child has a definite talent, the mother should be killed instantly, even if the child is only 6 years old," Weissenberg remembers appreciatively.

He studied at Juilliard with Olga Samaroff and worked intermittently with Wanda Landowska. He won the Philadelphia Youth Orchestra competition, and, in 1948, the Leventritt award, which had as its prize an appearance with the New York Philharmonic under George Szell. "In those days everybody knew he was a fire-eater,"

Pianist Alexis Weissenberg who will be playing at Tanglewood this Friday and Saturday

"We all seem to be geniuses taught by our mothers"

Harold Schonberg once wrote.

But over the years, instead of flourishing, his career began to fade, critics had second thoughts and, in 1957, his concertizing came to an abrupt halt. "There is really no solution," Weissenberg explains. "It's a problem that afflicts most young performers. If a young artist has the potentialities, it is essential for him to perform early before an audience to develop his personality. On the other hand, his inner gifts and the talent almost always need development privately. Many things are experimental and uncertain in you, and you are playing a lot of pieces badly. At such an early age one is not mature enough to be protected against the reactions that are often too violent from the critics and audience. Then, suddenly, you find the major orchestras don't re-engage you, you have neither dates in large cities nor recordings, and you have slid into playing too many community concerts (performing the same recital again and again in places like Oshkosh and Podunk). And how many times a year can one honestly and decently play 'Liebestraum' without going nuts?

"There is also the danger in being considered great and fabulous at too early an age, because you rarely live up to it later. And for how long can you be a promising brilliant young pianist? There comes a time when you have to be something more definite." He decided to take a sabbatical and left for Paris to "read more, live more, and rethink everything I had done. It was a desperate step."

Managing on a small family allowance, he studied literature and philosophy, married the daughter of a Spanish diplomat, and made his home in Madrid for a while. Weissenberg recalls this period as his "second formative years," when at nights he sharpened his intellect in parleys with writers, politicians and philosophers, and days probed into the works of Bach, Mozart, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, Bartok, Prokofiev and Stravinsky.

But what was intended as a temporary pause, a time for development and re-evaluation, threatened to turn into enforced retirement. And it was not until 1967 that Weissenberg re-emerged on the concert scene, largely through the efforts of a determined European concert manager, who introduced him to Herbert von Karajan. Von Karajan was impressed enough to invite him to open the Berlin Philharmonic's 1966-67 season. In February, 1967, he gave his first concert in the United States in 10 years. It was a triumphal return. Not only were the critics lavish in their praise, but soon requests for Weissenberg appearances came from major orchestras, summer festivals, television—and two recording companies offered contracts.

*

Like most artists whose jet-age existence binds them to a timetable, Weissenberg regiments his life fiercely. Speaking as rapidly and articulately as he plays the piano, he confides that he practices very little—only about two and a half hours a day. "But this is not a question of merit," he says emphatically. "I think it is a matter of concentration. Besides, I study the score first without an instrument. And only when I have thoroughly assimilated it, the technical work at the piano begins."

But isn't it also a matter of facility?

"Yes, but facility is the least guaranteed quality in an artist. Facility helps the original organization of the fingers, and it is what gives the performance spontaneity. But more important is that an interpreter has chewed up the work, has resolved within himself how he would like to perform it. There comes a moment when the application of your hands is not felt any longer, and the piece grows out of you and begins its own life within you. Then you can project it at will—I wouldn't say by pushing a button—but your entire mind and temperament switch instantly to that version which has taken shape in your body."

A firm believer in logic and control, Weissenberg has been accused of coldness in his interpretations. "Yes, and some critics even go so far as to say this is an IBM machine. But what does this mean? Too much directed by your head? Love, passion—doesn't it all go through your head? In music everything must be controlled, otherwise it falls into little pieces. But within the range of what I have decided to do in a piece, I am absolutely free. I may be more reserved one evening, and more spontaneous another."

What puzzles Weissenberg is that "the same public that expects something completely contemporary from an art exhibit or a novel is surprised that at a concert it does not get the same interpretation it has encountered for 50 years. Today, you express your feelings directly and without circumvention. Everything has become clearer and more naked. So many actors now act in the nude. If music is not to remain in a museum, an interpreter must speak in a language that today's people understand. You can still have feeling, only the manner in which you express this has changed. Take Chopin, for example. He is violent and tender, not hysterical and sweet."

*

Weissenberg sees no contradiction in melding the present with the past. "Blue jeans in a 17th-century home" is how he describes his lifestyle. Divorced from his wife, he lives informally in a second-floor apartment of a converted townhouse in Paris, opposite the Louvre, with a big black poodle named Tcherno (Bulgarian for black) and a Spanish couple who look after his needs.

He enjoys the company of a few close friends, but does not like parties and abhors after-concert receptions. "The compliments are wrong, because you know yourself whether the performance was a success or not. And if it was bad, you are miserable and even the applause does not help. But when you are unhappy, you don't want to be alone. (I sit up the whole night and remember the entire concert, everything. I go through every note, everything I didn't like.) What you need is a few loving people around you who will not talk about the concert."

Continued on Page 22

On Weissenberg

Continued from Page 11

Weissenberg usually vacations with his daughters, Cristina, 14, and Maria, 9, on the Spanish or French seacoasts, where his mother sometimes joins them. Occasionally he relaxes in Zermatt, Switzerland, his favorite mountain resort, but gets depressed when he stays there more than 10 days. "I could never imagine living in a quiet place. I need the quickness of the city, the nervousness. It recharges me." But for a physical and mental rest? "The sea does it for me. The sea is very nervous and violent."

The thought of the turbulent sea suddenly reminds him of his own intense, high-voltage existence. He glances at his watch, picks up his luggage, and in the descending elevator delivers his parting shot:

"I have been very lucky and I really have no right to complain. But I do wish people would stop talking about how I played 20 years ago. It sounds exactly like a prostitute who married a very rich man, and now lives on Park Avenue, and every now and then at a party someone reminds her that, originally, she was on the sidewalk. If the woman is elegant and intelligent and has made a good marriage, why should you always remind her that she was in a bar before?"

FAIR SEX

The Berkshire Eagle
Sunday, July 25, 1971
Page 3

Mary Riley: the BSO's "secret weapon"

By Warren Fowler

Twenty-nine years ago, Mary Scott Riley was born on the cusp of Pices and Aries and the outcome was an unorthodox alchemy of the two zodiacal signs. It produced a brass-plated marshmallow.

Mary Riley, on one hand, is a quiet, shy individual who prefers walking in the woods by herself, or the solitude of sitting on a lonely dune watching the waves lap against the shore, but let her get around music, a spotlight and a microphone and all hell breaks loose. As she said of herself about singing, "wild horses couldn't hold me once I get the feeling I want to get up and sing."

According to Mary, when her family isn't engaged in either eating or sleeping — it's singing, usually for their own enjoyment. Her twin sister, Mrs. Alice Anderson of Jacksonville, Florida, "doesn't look at all like me, but we're hell on wheels when we get together. Mother is completely tone deaf, but she sings anyway; my younger brother and sister sing, and Dad has a great bass that lends itself nicely to cocktail parties and Christmas carols."

•

She started taking voice lessons at the age of 12 when she decided "she was going to take the world of opera by storm." After years of youthful voice training she attended the Neighborhood Playhouse School of Theatre from which she graduated in 1964. Along with singing, fencing, speech and three kinds of dancing she had the good fortune to work with David Pressman as her director. "It was a concentrated three-year course in which they poured everything they could into you, and then you were left on your own in hopes that you'd make it," said Mary. "I pounded the New York pavements until I felt like an ex-Sarah Bernhardt, and I got so tired of being told, 'you may make it, but you'll have a long, long wait,' and I didn't feel quite up to living in a garret for 20 years waiting to be found. It was an extrememly frustrating 'thing' for me, and after a while I got the message and decided the best thing to do was leave New York for other points."

She played two summers of stock in Connecticut doing Gilbert & Sullivan's "Patience," Katishaw in "The Mikado," Eunice in "Streetcar Named Desire," Joe's wife in "Damn Yankee's," and Anita in "West Side Story."

•

The highly efficient Miss Riley has been employed full time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past three years as coordinator of the Tanglewood Friends. This means in effect, she is a "jack-of-all-trades" as her office is responsible for signing up about 2,000 new Friends yearly, doing the bookkeeping, acting as laison between the orchestra and the community during special events such as "Tanglewood on Parade", sending out notices to the Friends of upcoming events and if anything has been left out, doing the time consuming dirty-work involved in running the behemouth that is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This she and her small staff do with an alacrity and cheerfulness that would stun both Dale Carnegie and Henry Ford III.

Before her present stint as "office boy" for the BSO, she spent a year abroad as assistant to the general manager of the London Sinfonetta.

By the time Mary was in her late teens, she found she could do a creditable job singing folk songs and imitating Barbra Streisand fairly well. The summer of 1964 found her on Martha's Vinyard with a Yale friend Bill Eddy, whom she described as "a marvelous natural musician. We went down in the Vineyard history that year. We sang at a place called 'The Mooncrusher,' which isn't even in existance now, and I had a perfect ball. Bill put music to Eugene Field's 'Wynkin, Blinkin' and Nod' which we got so sick of singing that in desperation he scored 'Little Boy Blue' also by Fields, which we used for our theme song."

•

During 1965 she traveled abroad with some girl friends, "and I sang my way all over the continent. I started at the Hosteria del Orso, in Rome, went on to The Green Moon in Florence, then on to the Franco Pinot in Paris. I spent most of the summer singing and earning drinks for everyone," laughed Mary. When asked how she got started in all these places she said, "after a few drinks Riley would nestle up to the piano player and start humming in his left ear until finally in desperation he'd say, 'For God's sake, Mary, sing — I can't stand this infernal humming any more,' so I'd grab the mike, and from there on in it was all downhill." At this point she mused, "I can sing most anything I've heard only once. I've had four different voice teachers try to teach me to read music but it's just been impossible, I can't make head 'nor tails out of it. The only reason any of them put up with me, I guess, is because I've got a half-way decent voice."

In the fall of '65 she went to work at The New England Conservatory in Boston as their Friends secretary, and while there studied with Mark Pearson, a member of the vocal department, who, she said, "let me run the gamut of music — from opera to blues." While working at the Conservatory she sang spasmodically in a little Boston bar called the "What Ho", because as she said, "my voice, then, was graduating into a blues-nightclub style and I just followed along."

Mary admires most highly the voices and styles of Ella Fitzgerald, Barbra Striesand, Carmen McRae and Lani Kazan who is her favorite. "Most singers establish a style, said Mary, "a kind of melding from other singers who have made the grade — all of us do that, and it finally is distilled down into our own unique quality. For instance, I can pattern myself after any one of the famous vocalists, but in the final analysis no one sings like Mary Riley because it's finally my style and most important, the way I feel a song."

•

Several weeks ago, during the Friends of the BSO Gala evening which was held on the stage in the shed, Mary took the group by storm. The Gala was composed of a group of contributors to the Boston Symphony, and the violin and piano, playing for the assemblage was sinking slowly but surely. Because there were stage lights, music of sorts and an audience, Mary walked up to stage center and began belting out the words to "Never On Sunday" which the duo was playing. Her voice and personality, with which she's been endowed heavily in equal parts, was just what was called for, and the party sparked like a Roman candle from that moment on. After singing "The Lady Is A Tramp", Mary bowed off to delighted applause. After her performance, Stephanie Barber, former owner of Music Barn with her husband Phil, and who now run Wheatleigh, came up to Mary and said, "My but you're a cheeky young lass aren't you?" and The Eagle's, L. K. Miller strolled over and said, "Why Mary, I didn't know you were the BSO's secret weapon." "The sweet sound of applause once heard, is something one never forgets," said Mary, "and I'd be lying If I didn't say the stage, either musical comedy or night club, is really my first love."

Mary Riley, coordinator for the Friends of the BSO Photos by Warren Fowler

Mary is quite honest with herself, though, about her singing. "I don't really feel I'll ever get anywhere in that field, I'm not going to break my back trying to get into it again with all the attending frustrations. It's just that it's an incredible pleasure-filled thing that actually doesn't demand that I be on stage. I'd just as soon sing to a small group of admiring friends that appreciate me. I'm just going to leave that whole "bag" to luck and if it works out, fine, if not, well . . . I haven't got that consuming obsession one must have, the "thing" that singing must 'end all' and 'be all' is simply not strong enough in me. Besides, I'm too much a lover of people to be closed away with an obsession like that. That's why I finally got out of theatre — I just couldn't stand being away from the people that were friends and whom I loved."

Whether Mary "makes it" or not singing is entirely academic at this point, because given the chance, she could "stand tall" among most any group she sang for. The only thing that stands between her and "big name" success, is the the extra dollup of Pices marshmallow, which smothered the Aries brass, that in all probability would have spelled success.

154

Mary's date for the "Gala" was long-time friend, young David Ogilvie of Greenwich, Conn. Falling back on her earlier theatre training, Mary danced the Charleston in high style with her partner.

During recent "Gala Evening" for the Friends on the stage in the shed at Tanglewood, Mary sings, "Never On Sunday" and has most of the formally attired audience clapping their hands in rhythm to her song.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 106,767

JUL 11 1971

New England Newsclip

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

THE PRESS and public relations department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has turned out an impressive number of personalities in this essential but thinly populated segment of the musical profession.

A former Boston Symphony PR man is Francis Robinson, now assistant to the general manager of the Metropolitan Opera. Harry Beall is now president of the prestigious Judso Management in New York.

For the past three years, David S. Levenson has been press and public information assistant to Marvin Y. Schofer of the Boston Symphony.

On July 19, Levenson assumes duties as press and public relations director of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

He succeeds Herbert Weissenstein who moves to the New York Philharmonic as assistant to the manager. Weissenstein served as assistant in the Tanglewood press office a few summers ago.

Levenson, 29, and a Boston native, holds a bachelor of fine arts degree from Boston University. Prior to his work with the Boston Symphony, he was with the Opera Company of Boston and American National Opera Company.

NEW YORK City Center Ballet will not go on to the Blossom Music Center near Cleveland from Saratoga this summer as it has in the past.

Instead, the Vienna State Opera Ballet will include Blossom Center on its first American tour, giving four performances from Aug. 19 to 22.

The 250-year-old company will bring 50 principal dancers and the corps de ballet. Accompaniments will be by the Cleveland Orchestra.

Repertory includes Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofieff's "Therese," "Paquita "with music by Ludwig von Minkus, Bartok's "Miraculous Mandarin," and a "Vienna Divertissement." to music by Johann Strauss.

David Levenson

JACOB'S Pillow Dance Festival has announced a major change of program for its eighth week this summer, Aug. 10 to 14.

Maria Alba and her Spanish Dance Company are replacing the Boston Ballet Company. The Boston company is still programmed for the week of Aug. 3 to 7, with a special evening performance Aug. 8.

Calendar

TODAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bruno Maderna, conductor — Symphony No. 2, Schubert; Chamber Symphony, Opus 9b, Schoenberg; Piano Concerto No. 2, Chopin (Earl Wild), 2:30 p.m.

TUESDAY

Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y., New York City Ballet — Tuesday through Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Saturday matinee at 2:00 p.m.

WEDNESDAY

Woodstock (Conn.) Music Festival, Woodstock Academy — Philipp Naegele, violist, 8:30 p.m.

Methuen Memorial Music Hall, Methuen, Mass. — Donald R. M. Patterson, organist, 8:30 p.m.

THURSDAY

New Hampshire Music Festival, Inter-Lakes Auditorium, Meredith, N.H. — Symphony Orchestra, Thomas Nee, conductor — Symphony No. 38, "Prague," Mozart Concerto No. 1 for Piano, Trumpet and Strings, Opus 35, Shostakovich (Sylvia Zaremba, pianist); Andante Spianato & Grande Polonaise, Chopin; Suite (The Birds), Respighi, 8:30 p.m.

Ethnic Dance Arts, Barnstable Village Hall — Luis Rivera and his Spanish Dance Company, 8:30 p.m., (Repeat performances Friday and Saturday, 8:30 p.m.

FRIDAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Boston Symphony, William Steinberg, Brahms Program: Tragic Overture; Piano Concerto No. 2 (Vladimir Ashkenazy); Symphony No. 2, 9 p.m. (Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m.)

SATURDAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Boston Symphony, Steinberg — Brahms Program: Academic Festival Overtures; Concerto for Violin and Cello (Pinchas Zukerman and Zara Nelsova); Symphony No. 4, 8:30 p.m.

Music Mountain, Falls Village, Conn., Berkshire String Quartet, Julius Baker, flute, Zelda Manacher, mezzo-soprano — Flute Quartet, Viotti; A Creole Mystery, Beeson; Remembrance, Flagello; Quartet in D, Opus 11, Tchaikovsky, 3 p.m.

SUNDAY

Berkshire Music Festival, Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa — Marriage of Figaro Overture, Mozart; Piano Concerto, K. 595 (Ashkenazy); Alto Rhapsody, Brahms (Maureen Forrester); Haydn Variations, Brahms, 2:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 14 1971

New England Newsclip

The Piano Tuner

Another Craftsman In Danger of Extinction

By Edith Tarbescu

LENOX, Mass.

Of the many people involved in behind-the-scenes activities at Tanglewood, the piano tuner is among the most important. He must tune and maintain over 100 pianos used by the Berkshire Music Center as well as prepare the instruments used by soloists at the Music Shed.

George Krippenstapel has been piano tuner-in-residence at Tanglewood for the past four years. Associated with the Baldwin Concert and Artists Department in New York since 1966, he has tuned pianos for artists like Leonard Bernstein, Lorin Hollander, Byron Janis, Ruth Laredo, Andre Watts and Earl Wild.

Edith Tarbescu is a New York-based free-lance writer now working on a children's book.

Keeping the concert pianos tuned for the soloists who appear with the Boston Symphony is a complex task, because each artist has his own preferences in terms of touch and tone.

"For example," Krippenstapel says, "Andre Watts prefers a piano of considerable warmth and mellowness. Some artists prefer a lighter action than others. In doing any alteration, I always keep in mind the pianist who will be playing."

A skilled technician can significantly alter the characteristics of the piano. This is known as voicing or "tone regulating," and is an important aspect of concert work.

When a pianist arrives at Tanglewood, he usually chooses from among four or five concert grands. The pianist and the technician then work very closely together to achieve the desired effect on the particular instrument.

The piano tuner is also present while the pianist is rehearsing and especially during the performance, so that if the pianist should notice any problems, he can call on the tuner to adjust the piano. "Pianists never attempt any technical work on the pianos," Krippenstapel added.

"Another interesting feature of my job is to do novel and exotic tunings or sound effects that some of the modern composers specify for the piano during the performances of modern music at the Berkshire Music Center."

Piano tuning is becoming a lost art, Krippenstapel said. Approximately 150,000 pianos are sold in the United States each year, but there are not enough men qualified to service them.

Until 1929, there were many small factories around the country where hundreds of young men learned the many aspects of piano tuning. With the onset of the Depression, most of these companies were forced into bankruptcy and never reopened. Since that time there are few places where men can go to learn the necessary skills involved in piano tuning.

There are several mail-order companies and a few colleges that give practical courses on piano tuning. There are also a few piano technicians who take on apprentices. But the training facilities in this country are very inadequate.

"It takes thousands of hours, at least, to become a good tuner," Krippenstapel said. "A man should be supervised by an experienced technician on a wide variety of projects before he is ready to be left on his own. Although virtually anyone can be trained to hear what a piano tuner is supposed to hear, it takes thousands of hours to learn to manipulate the tools properly with the exact precision that is necessary."

Krippenstapel was an apprentice, without pay, to several highly skilled men for over two years. Then he went to work for Steinway & Sons, in New York. In 1963 he established his own business. His private customers have included Jacqueline Onassis, Benny Goodman, Mary Lou Williams and Virginia Eskin.

Reminiscing about his four years with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, he related an amusing experience that happened here two years ago. Pierre Boulez was scheduled to conduct the orchestra in the "Rhapsody for Violin and Orchestra" by Bela Bartok. A part in the score is specified for a cymbalom, an instrument associated with Hungarian gypsies (somewhat like an elaborate zither). The cymbalom player was a gypsy virtuoso who had never before performed with a symphony orchestra and who was extremely nervous.

"Boulez asked me to tune the piano to sound like a cymbalom," Krippenstapel recalled, "in case the cymbalom player became too nervous to play. I devised a way of padding the strings and the hammers of the piano so that it altered the sound to imitate the cymbalom, and Boulez was very impressed with the result."

The night of the performance the cymbalom player was on the stage at the cymbalom and the pianist was also sitting at the piano. My view was blocked and to this day I still don't know which instrument was played." ■

Al Weinman

Piano keys are reflected in Krippenstapel's glasses as he works

Al Weinman

George Krippenstapel checking a concert grand at Tanglewood

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

SEP 13 1971

ROBERT E. SHIESLEY

Honored For Tanglewood Vocal Work

Robert E. Shiesley, baritone recently made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in the Monteverdi "Vespers," with Seiji Ozawa, conducting.

At Tanglewood he was a member of the Music Theater Project and appeared in over twenty performances. He received the C. D. Jackson Award at the end of the summer for vocal excellence and outstanding performance from Gunther Schuller, artistic director of Tanglewood.

Mr. Shiesley received his bachelor degree in music education from State University College at Potsdam, Crane School of Music, and his master's degree from the University of Washington, Seattle. He has been studying on scholarship at the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

At present he is at San Juan, Puerto Rico, fulfilling a three-week engagement in the title role of Figaro in Mozart's Marriage of Figaro following which he will embark on a concert and operatic career.

Son of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley E. Shiesley, Waterford, he makes his home in New York City.

156

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 20 1971

New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Movies TV

Louis Plass, 36 Years at Tanglewood

LENOX — An operation as vast and complex as the eight-week Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood has many smaller components that function freely and easily and are as permanent and self-perpetuating as the majestic lawns and scenic beauties. One such component is the volunteer staff of ushers, parking attendants and ticket takers that serve year after year. Pittsfield resident Louis Plass has been part of this volunteer staff for 36 years.

Plass attended the first Berkshire Music Festival in 1936, when he was an usher at the Dan Hanna Farm for a weekend of three concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussivitzky. In 1939, the BSO received Tanglewood and Plass took his position at the box gate, which he still supervises.

"Each year we think maybe we'll go here or there, but when June rolls around, it's off to Tanglewood," he laughed.

He and his wife Dorothy generally arrive early and picnic before the crowds start coming. "One of the big changes in Tanglewood is the amount of picnicking done here. Years back, Tanglewood had a small society audience. Dress has changed, women who sat in the boxes always wore gowns and men, tuxedos. But today things are more informal, and people prefer relaxing and picnicking before the concert. One man has been coming here to picnic on the grounds as long as I can remember," continued the dedicated supervisor.

Looking not unlike a musician himself, Plass has many memories. One of the more prominent was his "match" with world heavyweight champion Gene Tunney. "Once the conductor is on the podium, we can't let anyone in until there is a break. One year when Koussy was conducting, the music had started and this great big guy came and wanted to be seated. We refused, and he was insistent. We kept arguing until there was a break and finally seated him. It turned out to be Gene Tunney."

Whitestone

Tanglewood box gate attendant for 36 years, Louis I. Plass, Pittsfield resident and retired GE technician, strikes pose he has used in ushering such celebrities as Eleanor Roosevelt and heavyweight Gene Tunney.

Celebrities have always come to Tanglewood, and part of Plass's job is to admit them into the box area off of Hawthorne Street. "Eleanor Roosevelt," he reminisced, "was, of course, memorable."

He had affectionate words for the various BSO music directors. He recalled that Koussevitzky "had great charm" and would always stop by to say hello. He called Erich Leinsdorf "a very gracious man" who always had a pleasant, very frequently funny, remark or two. Charles Munch, during open rehearsal breaks, often would "come to the back and ask us how we thought it was going."

Until his retirement this year, Plass was a technician in the plastics department of General Electric. He also is an avid record collector—Boston Symphony, of course.

Over the years, he has become close friends with a number of orchestra members. "I don't know how long I'll be here," he said. "But I enjoy music, the gentleness of the surroundings and, well, it's kind of in your blood."

ROLLING STONE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

SEP 2 1971

RANDOM NOTES

Seems that Officer Obie was just acting naturally when he snarled at Arlo in Alice's Restaurant. Only a week ago, Obie tried to stop a Byrds concert in Lenox, Massachusetts, where he is Chief of Police. He bounded onto the stage, grabbed Clarence White's fretting arm, and announced that he was about to pull the plugs. Clarence got a bruised arm but didn't miss a lick.

Obie's action against the Byrds was just the latest chapter in a summer-long feud between the Lenox Arts Center and Tanglewood Music Shed, which are two miles apart. Tanglewood, the summer home of Boston's symphony orchestra, complains that the folk and rock acts at Lenox play loudly, disturbing Tanglewood's concerts. On the night in question, Tanglewood patrons complained that Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto was being adulterated with strains of "So You Want to be a Rock and Roll Star." Rock partisans pointed out that on the same night, Tanglewood fired six cannons at the climax of the 1812 Overture.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

JUL 12 1971

Doc Directs Musician Tune-Up

BOSTON, Mass. (AP)—While musicians tune up their instruments, Dr. Keran Chobanian tunes up the musicians—sometimes using the piano as an examination table and the trombone bell as a head-mirror.

It may very well be the Boston Symphony is the only orchestra which has, even without the title, someone who is in effect its medical director.

Dr. Chobanian's association with the orchestra began in 1956 when he accompanied the musicians on a tour to Europe and Russia. He believes the trip was the first time that a touring orchestra took a physician along. On a tour, he usually takes along 350 pounds of medical equipment and supplies, including a battery-operated electrocardiogram machine.

He has worked out a health plan at the request of the management in which a majority of the musicians voluntarily participate, and he is kept informed on the members' health status.

ENTERPRISE
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 54,587

JUL 8 1971

New England Newsclip

Bill Pierce Does the Scene With Boston Symphony

Former WBET Program Director Talks About Tanglewood

By DOROTHY KAVKA

New inspiration and a new invitation to revel in it are provided for the annual Tanglewood season concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by William Pierce, former program director at WBET, now affiliated with the famed Symphony. Mr. Pierce, who resides in Hingham in a restored Cape, for the past 20 years has served as announcer for the Boston Symphony and tapes all the concerts emanating from Symphony Hall and from the Tanglewood Shed during the summer Berkshire Festival.

Founded in 1934, and this country's oldest major music festival, on eight successive weekends the Boston Symphony gives concerts in the Music Shed amid the wealth of scenic beauty which so moved Nathaniel Hawthorne (who lived on the grounds) that he wrote he could barely work in these surroundings.

New seating arrangements and chairs, with better visibility, have insured summer visitors this year — the 38th season of Tanglewood — a better-than-ever comfort during attendance. (From Boston one approaches Tanglewood via the Massachusetts Turnpike to Exit 1 or 2).

Concerts this summer will feature conductors Daniel Barenboim, Leonard Bernstein, Colin Davis, Arthur Fiedler, Leon Fleisher, Bruno Maderna and Seiji Ozawa, with open rehearsals in the Shed each Saturday morning at 10:30 providing a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists.

Eight weekends offering a Beethoven program July 25 in memory of Serge Koussevitzky; a Mozart program Aug. 8, directed by Colin Davis; and Berlioz' fascinating "Damnation of Faust" directed by Seiji Ozawa on Aug. 22 are among the outstanding musical treats listed. Friday evening ticket holders are privileged to attend the weekend "preludes" at 7 p.m., two hours before the concert, when guest artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals offer a bonus musicale.

Boston Pops will be presented by Arthur Fiedler in a Pension Fund Concert Tuesday, Aug. 3, at 8:30 featuring an all-Tchaikovsky program including the great "1812 Overture" complete with live cannons and fireworks.

Mr. Pierce, who was at WBET for five years, accompanied the Boston Symphony-Pops combined Orchestras to Europe this spring on tour. He found this a wonderful opportunity to become closer to the talented artists, and heartily recommends travel with musicians.

Visits to the homes of famous composers such as Beethoven, Schubert, and others were among the tour highlights, as was the wonderful food to which the entertainers were treated. The witty article written by Conductor Harry Ellis Dickson on his return, Mr. Pierce comments, completely captures the spirit of the tour — the first such tour of European cities in the Symphony's career.

Mr. Pierce enjoys taping the music for the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust, a world-wide service. He gets letters from Vietnam and the Peace Corps members and other "expatriates" who are happy to hear music from home. He is able to record it just as it is played.

157

The Boston Globe
(MORNING)
D. 225,000 SUN.

SEP 26 1971

New England Newsclip

CLASSICAL RECORDS

Fine simplicity marks Fleisher

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

It has been seven or eight years since Leon Fleisher, then still in his mid-thirties, stopped playing the piano because of a disabled right hand. He has begun to conduct, and it was a pleasure to encounter his musical intelligence and taste in a new package when he led a Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood in July, but I admit I had forgotten just how remarkable a pianist he was — and in part had, I think, never fully appreciated that while he was still active — until there was occasion to hear again his recordings with George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra of the Schumann and Grieg Piano Concertos, just reissued by Columbia and Odyssey label.

What touched me first was the simplicity of his playing of the Schumann. The piece, with its certain quality of inwardness and domesticity (as contrasted, say, with the idiosyncratic fantasy of "Kreisleriana"), likes that approach anyway, and beyond that it is an extra pleasure to be offered something so straight and clean in a work played as much as the Schumann is, one therefore particularly liable to attacks of originality in performance.

As you listen, you discover that the simplicity is also the frame for an extraordinary and subtle imagination, particularly with respect to rhythm. Everything is varied and elastic, though there is never a narcissistic statement of "watch me now," and the whole performance is a process of unfolding and developing, something that is the more remarkable given how mechanical Schumann's recapitulations are. The cadenza is the time for assertive personal statement, and what Fleisher unleashes there is torrential in its force because of the control and reserve exercised up to that point.

The Grieg is less of a piece than the Schumann, but the way to hear it, too, is certainly in playing as fresh as Fleisher's. Lipatti's beautiful playing of these two concertos (also Odyssey) has similar qualities, but Fleisher's, particularly in the Schumann, is more fiery. The completeness of the success of these performances rests of course to an enormous extent on the closeness of Szell's collaboration and the fine playing he got the Cleveland Orchestra to do. To cite just one detail: Szell certainly brings the middle of the second movement with the big cello tune to white heat, but right to the top you can tell what the rhythm is.

It is interesting to compare Fleisher's playing with that of some of the famous pianists in the first half of the century whose playing of Romantic repertory is so often cited as exemplary, and some of whose recordings have recently been reissued. Hearing Josef Hofmann, for example, is for me the constantly repeated experience of being unable to find a connection between the interpretive marvels his admirers describe and what I can only read as the hatred for music most of his playing exudes. The 1935 studio recordings of Chopin, including the first movement of the B minor Sonata and the "Military" Polonaise, have none of the capriciousness of the live performances which are the sources of most available Hofman recordings but they go equally destructively in the direction of brittle rattling off of notes: "very good Czerny playing," was the appropriate comment of a pianist for whom I played the record (Victrola, mono only).

Rachmaninoff's playing of Chopin could be arbitrary, his drastic rearrangement of the dynamics of the Funeral March in the B flat minor Sonata being the most famous example of that, and compared with the economy and elegance of Fleisher, of Ashkenazy at his best, or of a younger pianist like Garrick Ohlsson, it is apt to sound wildly overstated; still, it is arresting, it has nothing in it of mere fooling around a la Hofmann, and even at its craziest, it allows you access to the music at some reasonable perceptual level (Victrola, mono only).

Hofmann and Rachmaninoff just get their names on the record jackets: Josef Lhevinne also gets the title of "Master of the Romantic Piano." Most of what you get in his playing of Chopin, of Schumann, and of the Schulz-Evler arrangement of "The Blue Danube," is a lot of technical razzle-dazzle, but beyond that an unpleasing mixture of coldness and affectation. The playing with his wife, Rosina, of Ravel's two-piano version of Debussy's "Fetes" is remarkably elegant, though (Victrola, mono only).

Buffalo Evening News
D. 281,982 SAT. 297,247

JUL 12 1971

Famous Fables

By E. E. EDGAR

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who played under Serge Koussevitzky, never knew from one moment to the next whether they were in good standing or bad with their unpredictable conductor, relates Harry Ellis Dickson in "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please"

"He blew hot and cold. Words of praise could suddenly turn into harsh criticism. Once, after our second trombonist had finished playing a solo in the 'Russian Easter Overture,' Koussevitzky said to the man:

"I have heard this played many times with many orchestras. Never have I heard it played better!'

"The man beamed and we all scuffled our feet in the traditional manner of applause.

" 'Now let us try it again,' said Koussey.

"This time, before the trombonist had played two notes, the maestro stopped him and snapped, 'It's too loud. Let's do it over.'

"The next attempt was 'too soft,' the next 'out of tune,' and so on until Koussey finally lashed out with:

" 'It is the worst played I have ever heard!' "

RECORD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 433,372

JUL 6 1971

Today's Living

BSO's Dickson: Man for All Seasons

Seen through opera glasses, Harry Dickson conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Staff Photo by Earl Ostroff

● 'The greatest joy I have in life is meeting people who have never been to the Symphony before, who think that kind of music isn't for them.'

By ANN M. BEIERFIELD

If dynamic musician Harry Ellis Dickson writes another book — he's already produced a grand memoir of his many years with the Boston Symphony — it will be called "My Life With Danny Kaye."

Dickson, assistant conductor of the Pops and Esplanade concerts, and conductor of the Symphony's Youth Concerts, has been a longtime friend and often, international tour guest, of the famed comedian.

He likes to recall the time he visited Danny on the Paramount lot during the filming of "Me and the Colonel." The two of them were lunching in the studio commissary and the actor was pointing out celebrities at nearby tables.

"When I was with Danny I got a kick out of pretending I was a yokel from the sticks who didn't know anyone or anything," Dickson reminisces.

"He said to me, 'See that guy over there? That's Robert Taylor!'

★

"I said, 'Oh yes, of course, the very fine cello player!' Danny said, 'Are you crazy? That's Robert Taylor, the movie star!' And he took me over to the table and introduced us.

"Then he said to Taylor, 'Hey, you know what this guy thought you were? A cello player!' And Taylor said: 'Well, I am!'

"You see, I'd read somewhere that Taylor had taken some cello lessons from an excellent symphonic musician and really loved the instrument. This, of course, was all news to Danny, who just stood there with his mouth open!"

Danny is only one of many, great and small, young and old, who have been captivated by Dickson and his plain-spoken, gruffish, lively charm, the intensity of his love for music, his pride in the splendid aggregation of artists he belongs to, and his wonderfully stubborn intention of turning everyone on to the classics.

Or, at least, seeing that everyone gets a chance to hear them.

"The greatest joy I have in life is meeting people who have never been to the Symphony before, who think that kind of music isn't for them. Then they come to a concert, and maybe they'll come again, and before they know it, they're addicted!

People

"Music is like certain foods! Maybe at first you don't like these foods at all. The second time you like them a little more. Pretty soon they start to grow on you, and then you crave them."

Born in Cambridge a tailor's son, young Dickson was performing and conducting in vaudeville at age 12, part of a Keith circuit act called "Grace Hushen and Her Melody Boys."

★

A graduate of Somerville High and the New England Conservatory, he received further musical education in Berlin, returning to America in the midst of the Depression. He immediately plunged into work with the old Community Services Inc., an organization which, with the aid of a WPA grant, was setting up symphony orchestras and putting much-needed bread into the mouths of some 600 of Boston's finest musicians.

In 1938 he auditioned for a violin chair in the Boston Symphony, his accompanist being none other than Arthur Fiedler. Shortly after, he was handpicked for the orchestra by its late maestro Serge Koussevitzky, immortalized in Dickson's great book "Gentlemen, More Dolce, Please."

He has come a long way since that first, admittedly trembling, tryout. Under his baton, the Symphony has performed for throngs of music-lovers on the Esplanade and at the Youth Concerts, and lately, in the Summerthing concerts that tour the city. In these, the circumstances are not always conducive to tranquil undisturbed performing, and often, says Dickson, his musicians have been upset and disgruntled.

"Some feel we should not bring music into these areas. The stages are crowded, the amplifiers are faulty, and often the kids are unruly and push close to the stage, not because they are bad, but simply because they don't know how to behave at concerts.

"So some feel we should simply let people come hear us at the Esplanade. But unfortunately, these people will not always go to the Esplanade. Perhaps they think our music is not for them. But if we bring it to them and they hear it, they find that they love it. I got beautiful letters last year after the Charlestown concert."

(He conducts two more Summerthing performances — Wednesday evening at Rogers Park, Brighton, and Thursday evening at Smith Field in Hyde Park.)

A Brookline resident and father of two daughters — Mrs. Jinny Shain of Westwood and Mrs. Kitty Dukakis, wife of recent candidate for lieutenant governor, Michael Dukakis — Dickson believes the day must come when government will be obliged to resuce the arts financially.

★

"I am not optimistic about the future of the arts in this country. I don't see how we can survive without government subsidy, and politicians must become aware of this need. One reason I'm proud of Mike is that he started the Massachusettts Council on the Arts, as a legislator."

But he is thrilled with the response of young people to good music (though he deplores rock). He recalls: "Last year at a youth concert we celebrated the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth. We did the Ninth Symphony, with a chorus of boys from English High and girls from Jeremiah Burke School in Dorchester. Eighty percent were black, 5 percent could not read music.

"But how they loved to sing the 'Ode to Joy!' The boys would come dashing into rehearsals still in their football helmets.

"They begged to hear some concerts, so we saw to it that tickets for the rehearsals were made available to them. But the greatest thing of all happened after that performance.

"There was a big party, and they'd had a huge cake baked just for the occasion.

"And it had an inscription that read: 'Right On, Beethoven!' "

158

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 21 1971

New England Newsclip

This Conductor Sits With the Audience

John Oliver: "If you think you're too good for this chorus, watch out."

LENOX, Mass.

Most of us, at one time or another, have given vent to an urging of the spirit and have burst forth into song. The reaction to this may have varied somewhat, but the actual experience, from campfire to church choir, was pretty exhilarating. However, most of us eventually quelled our artistic muse to listen to voices more professionally trained than ours, at least part of the time.

John Oliver, Tanglewood's choral conductor, not only fully appreciates that vocal yearning, but knows how to take advantage of it for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This year, around January, Oliver made it known he was searching for singers to fill the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

"I auditioned about 160 people and ended up with around 60, so I had a lot to choose from. All of them are amateurs, although some are singing students or have sung before in church or school, but its not necessarily experience I'm after; it's a flair I want, an excitement about music. Good, intelligent, amateur singers make your best chorus — they have a love for music."

Then, once a week until the opening of Tanglewood, Oliver trained his 60 students in Boston, where he also has teaching positions at M.I.T. and Boston University. In the past, Oliver has struggled to have an entirely Boston-based chorus, and this year's Festival Chorus is one of the few at Tanglewood to have sung together for the whole training period and in all the major singing works presented this summer. "This year," he says, "the chorus has had a chance to really grow with each performance."

Oliver can well appreciate that process of development, having started out himself playing the piano and the church organ at the age of eight, and gradually working through his education years singing in all the choirs he could get his hands on: "You know, the usual story — I just kept going at it." Two years ago, BSO asked him to head their choral program.

By the time the chorus gets to Tanglewood, the basics are all there, and all that's left, according to Oliver, is what he calls the "polishing up," or the final touches.

"By picking my chorus so early, we have time to prepare. People don't seem to realize that that sense of space, of time, is very important; it makes up for the lack of experience and training that a full-time performer has."

All that's left to do now is introduce the singers to the individual conductors and let them work together for two or three days prior to the actual performance. It is at this point that the orchestra conductor modifies Oliver's efforts to fit his own idea on how the piece should sound. "Sometimes the conductor and I will agree on that point, and that's the easiest, but on other occasions, someone like Colin Davis will change something around and really make the whole thing work for him. If handled this way, the chorus sometimes comes out to a conductor as never before."

According to one member of that chorus, this transition period is not as tough as it might appear. Bebe Kinney, second soprano in the chorus and one of the people behind the counter at the Friends of Music at Tanglewood office, points out that "if a conductor has a different interpretation from John's, we change over to it easily because John has allowed for that in our initial training. It's very easy to pick up."

Bebe fits Oliver's description of an ideal choral member. She has never sung before in any sort of chorus or choir, but has taken singing lessons. When she heard about the auditions at the beginning of the year, she tried out, but didn't have much confidence. "The first time we met Oliver, he told us, 'If you think you're too good for this chorus, watch out; but if you think you're not good enough, then you've got a chance' and I got in."

From that time on, they were on his side: "He really knows how to boost the morale of the group with all sorts of praise and get a good sound out of us — he can pick out the most incredibly tiny details and smooth them out."

Oliver also makes his chorus participate in this search for "tiny details:" During a performance the entire chorus is not performing in sections; everyone is singing with everyone else. According to Bebe, "that way we get a feel of what everybody is doing in the chorus."

Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," the final performance at Tanglewood on Aug. 22, will be proof of the Oliver teaching technique, for not only the Festival Chorus will be involved, but also the Tanglewood Choir, a group of local singers. This brings the entire group up to around 140 singers. Oliver is really looking forward to this. "It's a drama, a real drama, and I think it will be a great experience for them, now that they've gone through an entire season building up for it."

For that Sunday performance, Oliver won't be on the stage, nor will he be in the wings; if things are as usual, he will be sitting quietly in the audience. "During the performance, it's out of your hands, and when you really get down to it, a lot of what comes out in the end can't be prepared." ■

Photos and Text

by

Archer Mayor

Bebe Kinney, soprano in the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, resting on the lawn after six months of hard work.

Just prior to rehearsal, Oliver and conductor Colin Davis talk shop.

t says of Oliver: "He really knows how to get a good sound out of us."

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 143,160

AUG 29 1971

Seiji Ozawa Emerges As Season's Favorite

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Ave Atque Vale! Ciao! Au revoir! Bye Bye, it's been grand to know you and do come again.

Saratoga Perofroming Arts Center (classicial section), Tanglewood, LakeGeorge Opera Fesitval, the many Arts Series sprinkled liberally around the upstate and New England greenery, have emitted each his final grunt and holler, his last scraps and smite, his last excursion into that heavenly bourne where are dispensed the sights and sounds that soothe and rejuvenate our lacerated sensibilities.

What kind of a summer season was it?

THE QUESTION is rhetorcial in the sense that, regardless of one's personal tastes and musical intolerances, the entire concept of music festivals held in the natural beauty of our area makes the whole thing worthy.

Tanglewood which ended last weekend unquestionably offered the most attractive programming from the point of view of the committed and serious concert goer. Along with the obligatory and still valuable Tchaikovsky and Liszt etc. were interspersed such contemporary and unusual works as Ruggles, "Sun-Treader," "Casseopia" by Takemitsu, Xenakis' "pol Ta Dhina" and Schuller's "Five Bagatelles," and Berio's "Serenade for Flute."

The choral works gien from the classical repertory were likewise of great interest as one rarely has the opportunity to hear so many in such a short period of time. Choral works by Bach, Monteverdi, Brahms, Mozart, Beethoven, and Berlioz were some of the highlights of the summer.

TWO INTERESTING impressions remain from the Tanglewood season. The first is that Colin Davis, who did some of the choral programs, appears from this seat to be one of the most impressive conductors in years in terms of the difficult meld of tone and balance between a big orchestra and big chorus. There are not many conductors otherwise gifted, over the years, who have had this capacity but Davis is surely one of them.

Continued on Page G-4

SEIJI OZAWA

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

AUG 10 1971

SPAC FAVORITE—Seiji Ozawa, the internationally renowned Japanese conductor, will make his only 1971 appearance at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center tomorrow night. Music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, he serves as co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

SEP 5 1971

New England Newsclip

TOP MAN—Seiji Ozawa had the lion's share of Tanglewood concerts, conducting seven, and Globe critic Michael Steinberg found his work outstanding.

Tanglewood scores with 'unsafe' music

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX — There were interesting features to the Berkshire Festival which ended at Tanglewood two weeks ago. The one that is both the most interesting and the most encouraging is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra did well at the box office though its programs were by no means limited to the hackneyed and the obvious. They included music from Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610, Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, "Sun treader" by Ruggles, a new work by Takemitsu, Hugh Wood's Cello Concerto (also short pieces by Berio, Schuller, and Xenakis), a Schubert Mass, the Elgar Symphony No. 1, Nielsen's 5th Symphony, and "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz. That can nicely stand comparison with what the orchestra proposes for its coming season in Boston; in imaginativeness and musical interest it ran far ahead of what the Philadelphia Orchestra offers its audiences at Robin Hood Dell and Saratoga, Cleveland at Blossom, Los Angeles in the Hollywood Bowl, and even Chicago at Ravinia.

The risk paid off variously. That a weekend of three Beethoven concerts, one of them conducted by Leonard Bernstein, broke box office records should surprise nobody, nor that combinations like Ashkenazy - Brahms - Forrester - Mozart - Ozawa (to be impartially alphabetic) or Beethoven-Eschenbach-Ozawa-Tchaikovsky did extremely well. Of course there were concerts that drew small audiences—which at Tanglewood means one big enough to fill Symphony Hall one and a half times — again, at least sometimes, to no one's surprise: Leon Fleisher and Bruno Maderna are not Big Names, however highly regarded their work may be in the profession. Michael Tilson Thomas does not pull in enormous crowds, and I was surprised to learn that Colin Davis has no great drawing power either (he got quite large audiences when he conducted Mozart and Mahler, but almost the summer's smallest when his programs included Dvorak, Elgar, Schubert, and the unknown Wood).

Still, with all these ups and downs, and with the usual Berkshire alternations of marvelous weather and impossible, the eight Boston Symphony weekends, consisting each of three concerts and the Saturday morning dress rehearsal of Sunday's program (open to the public for the benefit of the Pension Fund), had paid attendance of 202,954. That is an increase of 16,784 for the corresponding events of the 1970 Festival.

I am not Populist enough to regard these large figures as necessarily representing any great good in and of themselves. As someone wanting to find Tanglewood an interesting place to visit, I am of course delighted to see them because I hope they will encourage the Boston Symphony to continue to give summer concerts with so much that is fresh in them.

MUSIC, Page A-11

BSO Tanglewood policy takes chances and wins

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-9

The annual Boston Pops concert (for which there was a biblical downpour this year) and Tanglewood-on-Parade did somewhat less well this summer than last (14,068 between them as against 16,810), but what really caused the season's total attendance (237,379) to lag 20,000 behind last year's was the box office failure of the so-called Contemporary Trends series. I gather that it was the aim of Gunther Schuller as artistic co-director of Tanglewood to select performers for the series according to musical rather than commercial criteria, aligning that policy with what the Boston Symphony seemed so commendably to be trying to do with its own concerts.

I know too little about the worlds of non-classical music for my speculations about what works or what does not work at the box office to have any validity; therefore I shall simply report that while Sly and the Family Stone, plus The Paul Winter Consort and Marion Williams, drew 12,849 (about like the Ashkenazy-Ozawa concert and less than Bernstein and the Missa Solemnis), the combination of Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw, and Jeremy Steig had only 3449 (almost 1000 less than any Boston Symphony concert), Ray Charles, Symphonic Metamorphosis, and Roy Ayers, 4059, and that a P.D.Q. Bach concert was cancelled nearly two weeks ahead of time because a real box office catastrophe was in sight.

To get back to the Boston Symphony, its present program policy for Tanglewood carries artistic risks as well as commercial. With three different programs to prepare each week, as opposed to one-and-a-fraction in Boston, rehearsal time in relation to playing time is greatly diminished. In the past, when the orchestra's winter and summer bosses were the same, that pinch in the timetable was compensated by repeating many winter programs, or parts of them, at Tanglewood: very little such duplication is possible now. I imagine, too, that Tanglewood rehearsal time is slightly less efficient because of the schedule which makes it unavoidable that between a contract or another dress rehearsal very likely to be led by a different conductor, perhaps even one whose taste, temperament, and technique require the orchestra to be a very different instrument (Fleisher - Thomas-Maderna, Steinberg - Ozawa, Steinberg-Bernstein, Davis-Ozawa, were among this summer's collisions).

No surprise either, then, if things sometimes seemed scrappy. The specific results, though, were unpredictable: the orchestra did some horrendous playing even in familiar repertory (Brahms under Steinberg, for example, and, by general report and admission, Dvorak under Davis) and some that was superb, both in music it had done often (the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" for Ozawa) and in that which it has not (Berlioz with Ozawa, or the rehearsals — I did not hear the concert — of the Elgar 1st with Davis).

Of 24 concerts I heard ten and parts of seven others. Among the special pleasures in performance I would mention the intelligence and grace of Fleisher's conducting of Mozart's B flat Divertimento, K.287, the almost always interesting and sometimes willful Maderna, Bernstein and the Missa Solemnis, the seriousness and vitality of Colin Davis. As for soloists, there was the excellence of violinist Joseph Silverstein both in Bernstein's trashy Serenade and in the Brahms Double Concerto, his partner in the latter being Zara Nelsova, splendid there as well as in Wood's Cello Concerto; pianists Christoph Eschenbach (Beethoven No. 1) and Garrick Ohlsson (Prokofiev No. 2); and singers Phyllis Curtin and William Cochran (Missa Solemnis), and Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, and Kenneth Riegel (Mozart Requiem).

I have left Ozawa till last. With seven concerts, he conducted more than anyone else, but the summer was his more than just statistically, more even than a matter of its being his second year of imprinting as Artistic Co-Director his lively and catholic taste on the Festival. When, at Tanglewood in 1964, he first conducted the Boston Symphony, it was evident that he had enormous gifts, little experience, and less repertoire. A few years later, when success had moved in him rather violently, he found himself in that difficult position of sometimes having to conduct rather more music than he had taken time really to learn. This summer, he impressed me over and over as thoroughly prepared musically as well as technically, and as someone alive.

If I had to set the meanest possible exam for conductors, I should include the first movement of Bach's 6th Brandenburg and the Love Scene from the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet." Ozawa did both beautifully. I had reservations about his resolutely anti-scholarly Bach and about the excessive openness of sound and loudness sometimes of the Berlitz, but the non-stomping horizontality of the one, the uncanny sense of the tenderness as well as the excited stop-and-go of the other, were incredible. At other times, he gave us lithe Mozart, rhythmically sharp, intelligent Brahms, strong and alert framing of Eschenbach's witty Beethoven, Tchaikovsky that was clean, honest, nonhysterical, and the more moving and exciting for it, and a "Damnation of Faust" kept from being first-rate only by some ill-considered cuts. It is a happy thing for the Boston Symphony to have that level of artistic directorship, even if only for one-sixth of the year.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 75,525 AUG 29 1971

Seiji Ozawa Emerges As Season's Favorite

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

Ave Atque Vale! Ciao! Au revoir! Bye Bye, it's been grand to know you and do come again.

Saratoga Perofroming Arts Center (classicial section), Tanglewood, LakeGeorge Opera Fesitval, the many Arts Series sprinkled liberally around the upstate and New England greenery, have emitted each his final grunt and holler, his last scraps and smite, his last excursion into that heavenly bourne where are dispensed the sights and sounds that soothe and rejuvenate our lacerated sensibilities.

What kind of a summer season was it?

THE QUESTION is rhetorcial in the sense that, regardless of one's personal tastes and musical intolerances, the entire concept of music festivals held in the natural beauty of our area makes the whole thing worthy.

Tanglewood which ended last weekend unquestionably offered the most attractive programming from the point of view of the committed and serious concert goer. Along with the obligatory and still valuable Tchaikovsky and Liszt etc. were interspersed such contemporary and unusual works as Ruggles, "Sun-Treader," "Casseopia" by Takemitsu, Xenakis' "pol Ta Dhina" and Schuller's "Five Bagatelles," and Berio's "Serenade for Flute."

The choral works gien from the classical repertory were likewise of great interest as one rarely has the opportunity to hear so many in such a short period of time. Choral works by Bach, Monteverdi, Brahms, Mozart, Beethoven, and Berlioz were some of the highlights of the summer.

TWO INTERESTING impressions remain from the Tanglewood season. The first is that Colin Davis, who did some of the choral programs, appears from this seat to be one of the most impressive conductors in years in terms of the difficult meld of tone and balance between a big orchestra and big chorus. There are not many conductors otherwise gifted, over the years, who have had this capacity but Davis is surely one of them.

Continued on Page G-4

SEIJI OZAWA

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
AUG 10 1971

SPAC FAVORITE—Seiji Ozawa, the internationally renowned Japanese conductor, will make his only 1971 appearance at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center tomorrow night. Music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, he serves as co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 531,160
SEP 5 1971
New England Newsclip

TOP MAN—Seiji Ozawa had the lion's share of Tanglewood concerts, conducting seven, and Globe critic Michael Steinberg found his work outstanding.

Tanglewood scores with 'unsafe' music

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX — There were interesting features to the Berkshire Festival which ended at Tanglewood two weeks ago. The one that is both the most interesting and the most encouraging is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra did well at the box office though its programs were by no means limited to the hackneyed and the obvious. They included music from Monteverdi's Vespers of 1610, Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, "Sun treader" by Ruggles, a new work by Takemitsu, Hugh Wood's Cello Concerto (also short pieces by Berio, Schuller, and Xenakis), a Schubert Mass, the Elgar Symphony No. 1, Nielsen's 5th Symphony, and "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz. That can nicely stand comparison with what the orchestra proposes for its coming season in Boston; in imaginativeness and musical interest it ran far ahead of what the Philadelphia Orchestra offers its audiences at Robin Hood Dell and Saratoga, Cleveland at Blossom, Los Angeles in the Hollywood Bowl, and even Chicago at Ravinia.

The risk paid off variously. That a weekend of three Beethoven concerts, one of them conducted by Leonard Bernstein, broke box office records should surprise nobody, nor that combinations like Ashkenazy - Brahms - Forrester - Mozart - Ozawa (to be impartially alphabetic) or Beethoven-Eschenbach-Ozawa-Tchaikovsky did extremely well. Of course there were concerts that drew small audiences—which at Tanglewood means one big enough to fill Symphony Hall one and a half times — again, at least sometimes, to no one's surprise: Leon Fleisher and Bruno Maderna are not Big Names, however highly regarded their work may be in the profession. Michael Tilson Thomas does not pull in enormous crowds, and I was surprised to learn that Colin Davis has no great drawing power either (he got quite large audiences when he conducted Mozart and Mahler, but almost the summer's smallest when his programs included Dvorak, Elgar, Schubert, and the unknown Wood).

Still, with all these ups and downs, and with the usual Berkshire alternations of marvelous weather and impossible, the eight Boston Symphony weekends, consisting each of three concerts and the Saturday morning dress rehearsal of Sunday's program (open to the public for the benefit of the Pension Fund), had paid attendance of 202,954. That is an increase of 16,784 for the corresponding events of the 1970 Festival.

I am not Populist enough to regard these large figures as necessarily representing any great good in and of themselves. As someone wanting to find Tanglewood an interesting place to visit, I am of course delighted to see them because I hope they will encourage the Boston Symphony to continue to give summer concerts with so much that is fresh in them.

MUSIC, Page A-11

BSO Tanglewood policy takes chances and wins

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-9

The annual Boston Pops concert (for which there was a biblical downpour this year) and Tanglewood-on-Parade did somewhat less well this summer than last (14,068 between them as against 16,810), but what really caused the season's total attendance (237,379) to lag 20,000 behind last year's was the box office failure of the so-called Contemporary Trends series. I gather that it was the aim of Gunther Schuller as artistic co-director of Tanglewood to select performers for the series according to musical rather than commercial criteria, aligning that policy with what the Boston Symphony seemed so commendably to be trying to do with its own concerts.

I know too little about the worlds of non-classical music for my speculations about what works or what does not work at the box office to have any validity; therefore I shall simply report that while Sly and the Family Stone, plus The Paul Winter Consort and Marion Williams, drew 12,849 (about like the Ashkenazy-Ozawa concert and less than Bernstein and the Missa Solemnis), the combination of Chet Atkins, Doug Kershaw, and Jeremy Steig had only 3449 (almost 1000 less than any Boston Symphony concert), Ray Charles, Symphonic Metamorphosis, and Roy Ayers, 4059, and that a P.D.Q. Bach concert was cancelled nearly two weeks ahead of time because a real box office catastrophe was in sight.

To get back to the Boston Symphony, its present program policy for Tanglewood carries artistic risks as well as commercial. With three different programs to prepare each week, as opposed to one-and-a-fraction in Boston, rehearsal time in relation to playing time is greatly diminished. In the past, when the orchestra's winter and summer bosses were the same, that pinch in the timetable was compensated by repeating many winter programs, or parts of them, at Tanglewood: very little such duplication is possible now. I imagine, too, that Tanglewood rehearsal time is slightly less efficient because of the schedule which makes it unavoidable that between a contract or another dress rehearsal very likely to be led by a different conductor, perhaps even one whose taste, temperament, and technique require the orchestra to be a very different instrument (Fleisher - Thomas-Maderna, Steinberg - Ozawa, Steinberg-Bernstein, Davis-Ozawa, were among this summer's collisions).

No surprise either, then, if things sometimes seemed scrappy. The specific results, though, were unpredictable: the orchestra did some horrendous playing even in familiar repertory (Brahms under Steinberg, for example, and, by general report and admission, Dvorak under Davis) and some that was superb, both in music it had done often (the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" for Ozawa) and in that which it has not (Berlioz with Ozawa, or the rehearsals — I did not hear the concert — of the Elgar 1st with Davis).

Of 24 concerts I heard ten and parts of seven others. Among the special pleasures in performance I would mention the intelligence and grace of Fleisher's conducting of Mozart's B flat Divertimento, K.287, the almost always interesting and sometimes willful Maderna, Bernstein and the Missa Solemnis, the seriousness and vitality of Colin Davis. As for soloists, there was the excellence of violinist Joseph Silverstein both in Bernstein's trashy Serenade and in the Brahms Double Concerto, his partner in the latter being Zara Nelsova, splendid there as well as in Wood's Cello Concerto; pianists Christoph Eschenbach (Beethoven No. 1) and Garrick Ohlsson (Prokofiev No. 2); and singers Phyllis Curtin and William Cochran (Missa Solemnis), and Benita Valente, Beverly Wolff, and Kenneth Riegel (Mozart Requiem).

I have left Ozawa till last. With seven concerts, he conducted more than anyone else, but the summer was his more than just statistically, more even than a matter of its being his second year of imprinting as Artistic Co-Director his lively and catholic taste on the Festival. When, at Tanglewood in 1964, he first conducted the Boston Symphony, it was evident that he had enormous gifts, little experience, and less repertoire. A few years later, when success had moved in him rather violently, he found himself in that difficult position of sometimes having to conduct rather more music than he had taken time really to learn. This summer, he impressed me over and over as thoroughly prepared musically as well as technically, and as someone alive.

If I had to set the meanest possible exam for conductors, I should include the first movement of Bach's 6th Brandenburg and the Love Scene from the Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet." Ozawa did both beautifully. I had reservations about his resolutely anti-scholarly Bach and about the excessive openness of sound and loudness sometimes of the Berlitz, but the non-stomping horizontality of the one, the uncanny sense of the tenderness as well as the excited stop-and-go of the other, were incredible. At other times, he gave us lithe Mozart, rhythmically sharp, intelligent Brahms, strong and alert framing of Eschenbach's witty Beethoven. Tchaikovsky that was clean, honest, non-hysterical, and the more moving and exciting for it, and a "Damnation of Faust" kept from being first-rate only by some ill-considered cuts. It is a happy thing for the Boston Symphony to have that level of artistic directorship, even if only for one-sixth of the year.

160

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 117,499

AUG 22 1971 New England Newspaper

SEIJI OZAWA

JOYFUL BATON

Seiji Ozawa Just Loves to Conduct All Kinds of Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — At Tanglewood Seiji Ozawa, 35, conductor, music co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival and director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, was asked a difficult question. . . .

Let's say, Mr. Ozawa, that you are in a concert hall in heaven, in the audience, and you have control over the concert. What conductor do you choose and what soloist and what program?

He didn't hesitate, at first.

"I think I want to call Dinu Lipati, who is in heaven now, playing Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring." If he came in front of me playing a good piece on the piano, that is . . . maybe . . . that program is best for me."

No orchestra?

"Ah, then I need many, many, many days, many many concerts, many orchestras."

Name three.

"No, it's not possible . . . I don't know . . . I need (to think) . . . this conductor . . . that orchestra . . . this piece with this conductor . . . that takes about three hours to make a list."

(Dinu Lipati was a Rumanian pianist of very high reputation who died in 1950 when Ozawa was 15. The Bach piece he refers to is a three-minute chorale prelude that appears twice in Cantata No. 147 for the Feast of the Visitation and became famous under its now-well-known title when it was transcribed for piano 30 or 40 years ago by Dame Myra Hess.)

A few minutes later the difficult question was put to Ozawa in a different way: As a conductor, what kind of music do you do best? (This time there was a lot of hesitation and thoughtful struggle.)

"I don't know . . . maybe I don't want to know. I don't want to know now . . . Isn't that funny? It's very hard for me to choose because I think I don't want to know. I try not to think that way . . .

"For instance, when we (the Boston Symphony Orchestra) had chamber music here the first two weeks, I did an all-Bach program. It was a small orchestra, half-size orchestra and I really tried my best and I had fun."

"This orchestra (Boston) has a tradition,," he said, "a style of playing this . . . baroque-Bach or Mozart-classical . . . and when I try to (bring) this out, to match it with my music, it's really fine . . . a very happy moment . . .

"To me a good conductor is . . . ah . . . let them play how they feel."

Ozawa expresses a strong feeling for the "happy" circumstance that produces music when a hundred musicians of different backgrounds and attitudes play together on the same stage.

And he freely, even joyfully, accepts differences among orchestras, although his slight difficulty with the English language might hamper his saying so.

"Because I gave 'that' kind of direction, idea, to this orchestra," he says, "they played 'that' . . . "This might be different with another orchestra. I might give same direction, same idea, same conducting . . . different result. I might be happier, too, I don't know . . .

"But I'm part of it . . . I'm in it . . . that is marvelous!"

Ozawa always looks as if he is thoroughly enjoying himself when he is on the podium, no matter what kind of music he is conducting, and every question intended to discover his preferences is answered indirectly but apparently without evasion.

To try to detect a trend in his stylistic direction by looking for it in his concerts has been, so far, very difficult if not impossible.

He seems to have an affinity for all styles equally. The concerts he conducts are usually lively and vibrant; they tend to reflect the enthusiasm he displays so exuberantly on the podium.

And they seem to exhibit an unusual skill for enabling the members of the orchestra to bring to life exactly the kind of music the composer intended . . . on the surface.

There are listeners who say that while Ozawa's conducting shows an honest intention to carry out the wishes of the conductor, the result is often note-perfect and emotionally-shallow; this may be the fault of those listeners.

But it is possible that Ozawa would not give these listeners a strong argument. He has indicated in several ways that he is not ready to fit the kind of stylistic mold that presents conductors Bruno Walter as a Mahler expert, Knappertsbusch as a Wagnerian. Munch as a French impressionist and Berlioz expert and Szell as a classicist.

"I'm training myself now to conduct anything that should be played," he says. "The question (which do I like best?) is very hard because I don't know . . . I'm sure when I get to the age of Maestro Munch or even younger, I might say very clear . . . I could spend only five minutes to tell what kind of repertory I like, what kind of conductor I like, what period (in music history) I like."

Asked to chose between conducting a large orchestra with soloists and chorus and a small, precise chamber orchestra he says, "Both!", and shows a big, happy grin.

"I'm not kidding," he says. "I love both. I need that. It seems like, ah, food you know. I like to eat rice, but I love steak; I love vegetables fresh or vegetables cooked; I love Italian noodles. I love French sauce; I love Chinese sauce, and I really go crazy sometimes for English muffins made in America . . . and you know that's nowhere."

He could have said "everywhere," because that also what he meant. That's where many of his fans think he is, too . . . everywhere, musically and geographically, and they seem to like it.

Thousands appear to have as much fun watching him bounce and swing and dance boyishly on the podium as he has doing it.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,683 SUN. 200,492

SEP 5 1971

The World Of Music

Annual Pilgrimage To Tanglewood Results In Another Veritable Feast

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

The official count of people who attended the 37 major musical representations at Tanglewood this summer was 237,379. There were 24 concerts and 8 open rehearsals by the Boston Symphony, the Boston Pops, and Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual demonstration of the work of the young musicians of the Berkshire Music Center, plus three Contemporary Trends concerts.

The season's total attendance exceeds that of last summer, which is quite understandable to those of us who make an annual pilgrimage to the Berkshires to feast on the parade of conductors, soloists, the Boston Symphony's playing, and, of course, a staggering variety of musical programs.

Dr. Nelson recently returned from visits to eastern music centers.

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony and the oldest such summer festival, has its steady friends who return year after year to sit in the shed, which houses 6,000, or on the spacious lawns beyond. Even miserable weather which calls for umbrellas and galoshes — and sleeping bags for the lawn-addicts does not prevent the faithful from coming.

Not that all concerts are of the same caliber. What makes for the steady interest, however, is the work of the orchestra under various conductors and with the bevy of soloists who trek annually to Tanglewood. I was lucky this year, as I could make two stopovers to catch as much music as one can take over a weekend.

The first time around, I caught Bruno Maderna, whom I had known heretofore only as an avant-garde composer, being at the forefront of contemporary Italian composition together with Luciano Berio and Luigi Nono.

It seems, however, that he has had a double career abroad as a conductor as well, having conducted orchestras as well as opera. In America he has conducted the Pittsburgh and the Chicago Orchestras, and earlier this year he was guest conductor-composer in New York's Tully Hall. He was no novice, then, when he substituted for William Steinberg, the Boston's music director, who was scheduled for this one concert, and did very well indeed with what was primarily a standard program.

Mozart's "Prague" Symphony (No. 38 in D, K. 504) emerged virile and neat. With a sense for the lyric, Maderna doesn't go in for exaggerations. His beat is vigorous and clear, but for a very solid, stocky man he has also a way with delicacy and purity of playing. The Mozart was most likable.

That the ensuing Gunther Schuller work, "Five Bagatelles for Orchestra," instrumental abstractions, should emerge so well — as a matter of fact, it could not have been improved on —was no wonder, for this is Maderna's element.

The big surprise was his reading of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E (1883), a big, splashy, sprawling work, which was played to the hilt, clean and with huge climaxes. The work, if not reaching for Valhalla then surely for Parnassus, was very well proportioned, the balances kept, the textures clear.

Maderna was able to translate his feelings in very controlled movements with the whole man involved. Reputedly, he doesn't like Bruckner, which he had acquired only "recently," but for one so far removed from this kind of music, it was a truly worthy performance. Business-like in rehearsal, Maderna seems a most amiable man and obviously the orchestra played for him.

★ ★ ★

The following Sunday there was Colin Davis, chief conductor of the BBC Symphony in London, and, as of this October, music director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, doing an all-Mozart gram. He opened with the moving Kyrie in D minor (K. 341) and ended with the Requiem in the same key (K. 626).

Assisted by the well-trained Tanglewood Festival Chorus (John Oliver, director), the soloists in the Requiem were more than adequate. Contralto Beverly Wolff sounded beautiful; Benita Valente, the soprano, soared nicely, and tenor Kenneth Riegel and bass Robert Hale did well. The Tuba Mirum, Lacrimosa, and Benedictus were the best, with the opening Kyrie in the latter beautifully done. The solo quartet was at its best in the Benedictus.

Colin Davis controls his forces with highly disciplined gestures, but he nevertheless gets exactly what he wants, and both instrumentalists and vocalists meshed to obey his every wish. It was something to listen to as he whipped through the fugal sections — confident, sure, and not just for the sake of showing off. It was a thoroughly measured approach and projection and came off with telling effect.

In between, there was Mozart's Piano Concerto in C (K. 503), which was terribly disappointing. The soloist was Stephen Bishop, an American from Los Angeles who has made his career abroad, after study with Dame Myra Hess. It was a precious, tinkly performance and seemed ill-prepared.

★ ★ ★

What pleases one immensely, and must be a joy to the participating musicians, is the warm reception and the final love-feasts that the audiences bestow on them. But favorites are easily recognized and long-maned Seiji Ozawa surely is among them — to both orchestra and audiences.

Eccentric as he may be in appearance, i. e., dress and gesture, he gets results and conducts with a finesse, an abandon almost, a complete surrender to the emotional content of the music, even if at times it leads to a certain unnecessary choreography reminded of a younger Leonard Bernstein.

It was the last weekend of the season, and Ozawa devoted the Friday night concert to Prokofieff, Berlioz, and Tchaikovsky.

Prokofieff's "Suite from Romeo and Juliet," opus 64, is admittedly one of my favorites and don't ask me why. I loved what Ozawa did with it — dramatic and delicate in turn; it was great.

Young Garrick Ohlsson made a good impression with his playing of Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor, opus 16, a gargantuan feat every time — so Slavic, and so romantic. I always feel the ghost of Rachmaninoff when I hear it. Good cooperation between Ozawa and Ohlsson resulted in a very vivid rendition.

The love scene from Berlioz' "Romeo et Juliette," opus 17, seemed almost too tempered, however, and Tchaikovsky's well-known overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," sounded tired and unrefined. Somehow, it was very anti-climactic and it need not be that on any program. It just didn't click.

★ ★ ★

Ozawa was again the conductor for the final Sunday afternoon program which was turned over to Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust," a dramatic legend. I remember only too well last summer's final program, when Ozawa did Berlioz' Requiem. Berlioz seems to be one of Ozawa's specialties and loves, for he does his music with all the drama and outpouring one can squeeze from it.

Again, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, some 150 singers, sang eloquently. Tenor John Alexander sang outstandingly as Faust, followed by bass-baritone Ezio Flagello as Mephistopheles. I have greatest admiration for soprano Lois Marshall; but I think in this work she was miscast. There were other voices and boys choruses, all of whom did well.

Berlioz' "Faust" is not based on Goethe's version. It is his own, in which the play is subservient to some of the most masterful music ever written — from the most subtle, as the music of the sylphs and the will-o'-the-wisps (Goethe's "Irrlichter"), to the carousing "Song of the Rat" and the "Song of the Flea," and on to folk-like tunes as "The King of Thule" and raucous sounds like "The Ride to the Abyss" and the "Hungarian (Rakoczy) March."

Megalomaniac perhaps, but, with rarest of musical intuition, great music!

It was an all-around tour de force and Ozawa, a very devoted disciple, conducted the whole work with the closed score before him, completely imbued with the spirit of the work. The rousing ovation was fully deserved.

The Saturday night concert had been conducted by yet another conductor, the very youthful but ever-so-talented Michael Tilson Thomas, at 27 associate conductor of the Boston Symphony and this fall also music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic.

Just as he gave the downbeat for the J.C. Bach Symphony for Double Orchestra in E-flat, opus 18, No. 1, there was a responding roll of thunder — but not in the score. There was a momentary hesitation, a round of applause — goodness knows why — and then the charming chamber music of Bach's youngest son.

Thomas gave the Symphony No. 5, opus 50, by Carl Nielsen, the Danish composer (1865-1931), a very powerful reading. It is a war symphony, written in 1922, which continues the grim war-time spirit of the Symphony No. 4, "The Inextinguishable," depicting the fight between good and evil with the victory of light over dark, the active over the vegetative life.

Structurally, it is a "modern" work, as it meanders through the tonalities and mounts long climaxes. Eclectic, it has a passion all its own and Thomas gave it a superb projection.

Alexis Weissenberg, an immensely talented and fastidious pianist, was the soloist in Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, opus 23, and proved that he can play with the best of them — but with one exception. He played some passages faster than the ear can follow, as if the fingers were running away — bent on a collision course which never happens — while in slower passages, there was an immense sense of pacing and dynamic gradation. Why these computerized fast passages?

Weissenberg also played a delightful "Weekend Prelude" on Friday preceding the orchestral concert, in which he did so well with Franck-Bauer's Prelude, Fugue and Variation, opus 18, and Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, opus 13, plus four encores.

There is no space to list all the other orchestral offerings and the Berkshire Music Center activities, a very concentrated and rich feast of music indeed.

But it is quite apparent that after all these years, Tanglewood has not lost its appeal. On the contrary, it is now a summer tradition, a very great one that has no lack of admirers. And it is a gathering place for many, among them conductors and fellow-artists and least but not last, a school of fellow critics — some dozen the last weekend.

TALENTED conductors at Tanglewood this year included Colin Davis, left; 27-year-old Michael Tilson - Thomas, center, and Bruno Maderna.

162

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1971 New England Newsclip

BSO's Playing Drew More in '71; Over-All Tanglewood Total Fell

Tanglewood attendance was up, or down, this year, according to which way you look at the figures.

Total attendance for all events this season was 237,379, or 20,040 less than last year's 257,419.

However, this year there were only three Contemporary Trends concerts, while last year there were six. Attendance at strictly Boston Symphony Orchestra events—the 24 main concerts, 8 open rehearsals, Pops and Tanglewood-on-Parade—was 217,022, which is 14,022 more than last year's 203,000 for the same events.

The weekend of July 23 had highest attendance this year with 38,186 present for all events. That weekend featured William Steinberg conducting Beethoven and Leonard Bernstein doing the Missa Solemnis.

Past Weekend

This past weekend there was an audience of 25,283, with a Sunday high of 8,949. Friday night there were 6,191; Saturday morning's rehearsal drew 2,985; and Saturday night's concert, 7,158.

The Contemporary Trends concerts drew disappointing audiences this season, with only the crowd of 12,849 for the Sly and the Family Stone show coming anywhere near last season's three big draws. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center, which does more than 30 popular concerts, drew some huge crowds, including 32,000 for the Who for its season. Saratoga, on the other hand, barely held its own with its Philadelphia Orchestra and New York City Ballet concerts. SPAC sent out a late-season appeal for contributions, indicating its deficit will be closer to $500,000 as opposed to last season's deficit of $350,000.

Six Retiring

Six players retired from the BSO as of yesterday's finale. They are Herman Silberman, John Korman, Christopher Kimber, William Stokking, James Stagliano and Paul Kenney. Joining the BSO this fall will be violinist Darlene Gray, Harvey Seigel and Ronald Wilkinson, cellist Jonathan Miller and trombonist Gordon Hallberg.

Associate manager Harry J. Kraut is leaving the BSO to join Leonard Bernstein's production firm, Amberson Productions, to oversee the firm's interests in TV, film and cassette projects. Press manager Marvin Y. Schofer is also leaving to join the conductor's division of Columbia Artists Management.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

AUG 25 1971 New England Newsclip

It all depends on how you look at it but Tanglewood had an up and down season, attendance-wise, that is. If one were to look just at the attendance figures it would show that it had 20,040 less attendees than last season's 257,419.

However, this year there were only three Contemporary Trends concerts, while last year there were six. These concerts drew disappointing audiences this season, with only the crowd of 12,849 for the Sly and the Family Stone show coming anywhere near last season's three big draws.

However, attendance at strictly Boston Symphony events at Tanglewood—24 main concerts, 8 open rehearsals, Pops and Tanglewood - On - Parade — was 217,022, which is 14,022 more than were drawn into last year's concerts.

It is interesting to note that on the other hand the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, which does more than 30 popular concerts, drew some huge crowds, including 32,000 there for the Who group. But on the other hand Saratoga barely held its own with its Philadelphia Orchestra and New York City Ballet concerts. In fact Saratoga has raised the red flag and sent out late season appeal for contributions, indicating its deficit will be close to $500,000. The previous season the deficit was $350,000.

It could be that Tanglewood and its environs are more adaptable to the symphony than the modern trends and the reverse could be true in the more sporting Saratoga setting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1971 New England Newsclip

In Brief . . .

Boston Symphony Orchestra players (all 105 of them) can take solid satisfaction that their 26 instrumental concerts at Tanglewood this year drew 14,000 more paid admissions than last year . . . For several reasons the so-called "Trends" concerts didn't do well at Tanglewood, which perhaps is distressing to the orchestra exchequer. Insofar, however, as mod-pop presentations are essentially sideshow and the main tent is symphonic repertory, the prognosis for Tanglewood must remain good, despite competing summer festivals and the sometimes-voiced opinion that the symphony orchestra and symphonic music are anachronistic . . .

Whatever wails there be for the phasing out of Pittsfield's Western Union, except for metropolitan newspaper stringers, must have overtones of urban chauvinism — or perhaps nostalgia. But the uniformed Western Union boy on his bicycle is as outdated as the surrey with the fringe on top. No put-down of the bicycle, you understand; it's good to see it coming back so strong . . . It's interesting that the Republicans in Canaan, Connecticut, have nominated the town's Congregational minister for the post of first selectman. It apparently was not lost on the town's political leaders that a Hartford Presbyterian minister made a very respectable run for the U.S. Senate seat on the Democratic ticket last November and that a Jesuit priest from Eastern Massachusetts sits in the U.S. House of Representatives. The pulpit apparently is no longer the political bar it once was, at least in southern New England.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

AUG 8 1971 New England Newsclip

MARJORIE SHERMAN

No recession at Tanglewood

Music still hath those charms — at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's home away from home in the Berkshires — where the '71 concert tab is $27,000 ahead of last season's in spite of the recession.

Despite the rain, 10,000 fans swarmed into this week's Tuesday Pension Fund concert conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

The Fiedlers and soloist Earl Wild were given a great party afterwards by the BSO's Tom and Anne Perry at their West Stockbridge house where the mountain view is a favorite of every musician within reach.

There, in borrowed raincoats, were stalwart clutches of BSO trustees plus Tanglewood's man-of-the-year, Bruno Maderna, the composer in residence at the Saranac Cottage, who already is signed up for next year on the teaching faculty.

Boston remembers him for the fantastic production of "Intolleranza," the Luigi Nono-Sarah Caldwell opera coup of several seasons ago, and he's due back here for guest conducting sometime in '72. Maderna conducted last night (Hindemith, Schuller and Bruckner) in place of William Steinberg.

Due in today at Tanglewood is Paul Fromm, who established the Music Foundation bearing his name.

Connoisseur of old wines and new music and a national benefactor of research on children's diseases, Paul Fromm will have a guest membership for "The Tent," the private club for Tanglewood season patrons. Its enormous hanging fuchsias are the delight of the garden-minded and the pride of Superintendent Jim Kiley who took over from gardener Ward Gaston.

Ward was famous for fuchsias when the Tappans were still living in the old red house before the late Serge Koussevitzky was given the Tanglewood property for a summer home. His widow, Olga Koussevitzky, does her usual gracious stint of welcoming music people of the world in the low-walled terrace of her big white house with its superb view of the Berkshires.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

SEP 7 1971 New England

Tourist business booms in Berkshires...

By all accounts, tourist business in the Berkshires this summer was greater than last year despite — or, perhaps, because — of prevailing economic conditions.

While no one can readily explain trends of this sort, the tightening of the family pursestrings seems to have fostered increased tourism in rural areas far from the crush of crowds and accompanying expenses.

John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, believes that Americans this summer had a tendency to vacation relatively close to home because of the dollar pinch and renewed awareness of scenic areas within their reach.

His theory appears sound, since camping activity — whether by choice or necessity — mushroomed in the Berkshires this summer, with state forests and municipal campgrounds hosting capacity crowds almost every weekend.

Mr. Geary said his organization began concentrating its advertising campaign this year in the New York City metropolitan area rather than Boston, and this seems to have paid off.

Instead of Europe or crowded seaside resorts, Mr. Geary said, many New Yorkers this year chose to spend a less expensive and more casual vacation in the mountains, especially in the Berkshires where entertainment is plentiful.

The Williamstown Summer Theatre reflected this in audience counts this summer that showed a 16 per cent rise over 1970 attendance. "Cyrano," the theater's first production this year and a smash hit, broke all records with sell-out crowds every night of its performance. The actors played to an average audience of 80 per cent capacity over the season and ended the run with a record ticket income of $15,000 for "The Man of La Mancha."

The Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge accounted for a spectacular 70 per cent increase in attendance this summer over last year. The theater four new plays, three music benefit performances, and five barn workshop shows staged by Syracuse University and Boston University drama students.

The 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood drew larger crowds this season than in 1970, although the total attendance figure was 237,379, or 20,040 less than last year.

The drop was attributed to the fact that Tanglewood last year produced six heavily-attended Contemporary Trends concerts, while only three rock shows were sponsored this summer.

Besides musical and dramatic entertainment, the other recreational pursuit showing a considerable increase this year was camping, and its related activities, sightseeing and picnicking.

Robert J. Mogul, assistant director of the state Department of Natural Resource's Berkshire region, said there was a noticeable rise in tourist circulation in forests and woodlands this summer, partly because of the beautiful weather and partly because of a growing trend toward "returning to nature."

Tourism has been particularly heavy on Mt. Greylock, where well over 3,000 visitors took in the five-state view and scenic surroundings most weeks. Camping patronage at South Pond campgrounds in Savoy and at Clarksburg State Forest was heavy also.

Mr. Mogul said attendance at other state parks in the Berkshires was similarly high, although he could not compute an exact comparison with tourist counts for last year.

"I'm not that clever," the DNR executive laughed.

Motels did a respectable business this summer, although they did not reflect the dramatic rise in such areas as theatre attendance. The Springs Motor Inn in New Ashford, one of the county's largest motels, found business "as good or a little better" than in 1970. Jug End resort in South Egremont, a perennial favorite of urban dwellers, reported a much better seasonal record, with 15 to 20 per cent rise in business volume over last year.

Tourism along the Mohawk Trail, with its natural vistas and plenitude of gift and specialty shops, was likewise high this summer. Although the season started slow, warm weather and blue skies later attracted the largest number of motorists in years, according to Emma Blizzard, executive director of the Mohawk Trail Assn.

Miss Blizzard attributed the increased traffic to a growing distaste among drivers for high-speed turnpikes and expressways.

162

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1971

New England Newsclip

BSO's Playing Drew More in '71; Over-All Tanglewood Total Fell

Tanglewood attendance was up, or down, this year, according to which way you look at the figures.

Total attendance for all events this season was 237,379, or 20,040 less than last year's 257,419.

However, this year there were only three Contemporary Trends concerts, while last year there were six. Attendance at strictly Boston Symphony Orchestra events—the 24 main concerts, 8 open rehearsals, Pops and Tanglewood-on-Parade—was 217,022, which is 14,022 more than last year's 203,000 for the same events.

The weekend of July 23 had highest attendance this year with 38,186 present for all events. That weekend featured William Steinberg conducting Beethoven and Leonard Bernstein doing the Missa Solemnis.

Past Weekend

This past weekend there was an audience of 25,283, with a Sunday high of 8,949. Friday night there were 6,191; Saturday morning's rehearsal drew 2,985; and Saturday night's concert, 7,158.

The Contemporary Trends concerts drew disappointing audiences this season, with only the crowd of 12,849 for the Sly and the Family Stone show coming anywhere near last season's three big draws. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center, which does more than 30 popular concerts, drew some huge crowds, including 32,000 for the Who for its season. Saratoga, on the other hand, barely held its own with its Philadelphia Orchestra and New York City Ballet concerts. SPAC sent out a late-season appeal for contributions, indicating its deficit will be closer to $500,000 as opposed to last season's deficit of $350,000.

Six Retiring

Six players retired from the BSO as of yesterday's finale. They are Herman Silberman, John Korman, Christopher Kimber, William Stokking, James Stagliano and Paul Kenney. Joining the BSO this fall will be violinist Darlene Gray, Harvey Seigel and Ronald Wilkinson, cellist Jonathan Miller and trombonist Gordon Hallberg.

Associate manager Harry J. Kraut is leaving the BSO to join Leonard Bernstein's production firm, Amberson Productions, to oversee the firm's interests in TV, film and cassette projects. Press manager Marvin Y. Schofer is also leaving to join the conductor's division of Columbia Artists Management.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

AUG 25 1971

New England Newsclip

It all depends on how you look at it but Tanglewood had an up and down season, attendance-wise, that is. If one were to look just at the attendance figures it would show that it had 20,040 less attendees than last season's 257,419.

However, this year there were only three Contemporary Trends concerts, while last year there were six. These concerts drew disappointing audiences this season, with only the crowd of 12,849 for the Sly and the Family Stone show coming anywhere near last season's three big draws.

However, attendance at strictly Boston Symphony events at Tanglewood—24 main concerts, 8 open rehearsals, Pops and Tanglewood - On - Parade — was 217,022, which is 14,022 more than were drawn into last year's concerts.

It is interesting to note that on the other hand the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, which does more than 30 popular concerts, drew some huge crowds, including 32,000 there for the Who group. But on the other hand Saratoga barely held its own with its Philadelphia Orchestra and New York City Ballet concerts. In fact Saratoga has raised the red flag and sent out late season appeal for contributions, indicating its deficit will be close to $500,000. The previous season the deficit was $350,000.

It could be that Tanglewood and its environs are more adaptable to the symphony than the modern trends and the reverse could be true in the more sporting Saratoga setting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 23 1971

New England Newsclip

In Brief . . .

Boston Symphony Orchestra players (all 105 of them) can take solid satisfaction that their 26 instrumental concerts at Tanglewood this year drew 14,000 more paid admissions than last year . . . For several reasons the so-called "Trends" concerts didn't do well at Tanglewood, which perhaps is distressing to the orchestra exchequer. Insofar, however, as mod-pop presentations are essentially sideshow and the main tent is symphonic repertory, the prognosis for Tanglewood must remain good, despite competing summer festivals and the sometimes-voiced opinion that the symphony orchestra and symphonic music are anachronistic . . .

Whatever wails there be for the phasing out of Pittsfield's Western Union, except for metropolitan newspaper stringers, must have overtones of urban chauvinism — or perhaps nostalgia. But the uniformed Western Union boy on his bicycle is as outdated as the surrey with the fringe on top. No put-down of the bicycle, you understand; it's good to see it coming back so strong . . . It's interesting that the Republicans in Canaan, Connecticut, have nominated the town's Congregational minister for the post of first selectman. It apparently was not lost on the town's political leaders that a Hartford Presbyterian minister made a very respectable run for the U.S. Senate seat on the Democratic ticket last November and that a Jesuit priest from Eastern Massachusetts sits in the U.S. House of Representatives. The pulpit apparently is no longer the political bar it once was, at least in southern New England.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,160

AUG 8 1971

New England Newsclip

MARJORIE SHERMAN

No recession at Tanglewood

Music still hath those charms — at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's home away from home in the Berkshires — where the '71 concert tab is $27,000 ahead of last season's in spite of the recession.

Despite the rain, 10,000 fans swarmed into this week's Tuesday Pension Fund concert conducted by Arthur Fiedler.

The Fiedlers and soloist Earl Wild were given a great party afterwards by the BSO's Tom and Anne Perry at their West Stockbridge house where the mountain view is a favorite of every musician within reach.

There, in borrowed raincoats, were stalwart clutches of BSO trustees plus Tanglewood's man-of-the-year, Bruno Maderna, the composer in residence at the Saranac Cottage, who already is signed up for next year on the teaching faculty.

Boston remembers him for the fantastic production of "Intolleranza," the Luigi Nono-Sarah Caldwell opera coup of several seasons ago, and he's due back here for guest conducting sometime in '72. Maderna conducted last night (Hindemith, Schuller and Bruckner) in place of William Steinberg.

Due in today at Tanglewood is Paul Fromm, who established the Music Foundation bearing his name.

Connoisseur of old wines and new music and a national benefactor of research on children's diseases, Paul Fromm will have a guest membership for "The Tent," the private club for Tanglewood season patrons. Its enormous hanging fuchsias are the delight of the garden-minded and the pride of Superintendent Jim Kiley who took over from gardener Ward Gaston.

Ward was famous for fuchsias when the Tappans were still living in the old red house before the late Serge Koussevitzky was given the Tanglewood property for a summer home. His widow, Olga Koussevitzky, does her usual gracious stint of welcoming music people of the world in the low-walled terrace of her big white house with its superb view of the Berkshires.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,225

SEP 7 1971

New England

Tourist business booms in Berkshires...

By all accounts, tourist business in the Berkshires this summer was greater than last year despite — or, perhaps, because — of prevailing economic conditions.

While no one can readily explain trends of this sort, the tightening of the family pursestrings seems to have fostered increased tourism in rural areas far from the crush of crowds and accompanying expenses.

John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, believes that Americans this summer had a tendency to vacation relatively close to home because of the dollar pinch and renewed awareness of scenic areas within their reach.

His theory appears sound, since camping activity — whether by choice or necessity — mushroomed in the Berkshires this summer, with state forests and municipal campgrounds hosting capacity crowds almost every weekend.

Mr. Geary said his organization began concentrating its advertising campaign this year in the New York City metropolitan area rather than Boston, and this seems to have paid off.

Instead of Europe or crowded seaside resorts, Mr. Geary said, many New Yorkers this year chose to spend a less expensive and more casual vacation in the mountains, especially in the Berkshires where entertainment is plentiful.

The Williamstown Summer Theatre reflected this in audience counts this summer that showed a 16 per cent rise over 1970 attendance. "Cyrano," the theater's first production this year and a smash hit, broke all records with sell-out crowds every night of its performance. The actors played to an average audience of 80 per cent capacity over the season and ended the run with a record ticket income of $15,000 for "The Man of La Mancha."

The Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge accounted for a spectacular 70 per cent increase in attendance this summer over last year. The theater four new plays, three music benefit performances, and five barn workshop shows staged by Syracuse University and Boston University drama students.

The 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood drew larger crowds this season than in 1970, although the total attendance figure was 237,379, or 20,040 less than last year.

The drop was attributed to the fact that Tanglewood last year produced six heavily-attended Contemporary Trends concerts, while only three rock shows were sponsored this summer.

Besides musical and dramatic entertainment, the other recreational pursuit showing a considerable increase this year was camping, and its related activities, sightseeing and picnicking.

Robert J. Mogul, assistant director of the state Department of Natural Resource's Berkshire region, said there was a noticeable rise in tourist circulation in forests and woodlands this summer, partly because of the beautiful weather and partly because of a growing trend toward "returning to nature."

Tourism has been particularly heavy on Mt. Greylock, where well over 3,000 visitors took in the five-state view and scenic surroundings most weeks. Camping patronage at South Pond campgrounds in Savoy and at Clarksburg State Forest was heavy also.

Mr. Mogul said attendance at other state parks in the Berkshires was similarly high, although he could not compute an exact comparison with tourist counts for last year.

"I'm not that clever," the DNR executive laughed.

Motels did a respectable business this summer, although they did not reflect the dramatic rise in such areas as theatre attendance. The Springs Motor Inn in New Ashford, one of the county's largest motels, found business "as good or a little better" than in 1970. Jug End resort in South Egremont, a perennial favorite of urban dwellers, reported a much better seasonal record, with 15 to 20 per cent rise in business volume over last year.

Tourism along the Mohawk Trail, with its natural vistas and plenitude of gift and specialty shops, was likewise high this summer. Although the season started slow, warm weather and blue skies later attracted the largest number of motorists in years, according to Emma Blizzard, executive director of the Mohawk Trail Assn.

Miss Blizzard attributed the increased traffic to a growing distaste among drivers for high-speed turnpikes and expressways.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 11,891

AUG 14 1971

New England
Newsclip

Also at Tanglewood

A Symphony of Faces

For a people-watcher, sitting on the Tanglewood lawn during a Sunday afternoon concert is a lazy experience. He can lie on his back in the sun, absorbing picture after picture of glorious facial expressions and positions without ever having to move to another spot.

As he spends time looking at the people around him, he becomes more and more involved, not only in the different faces, but also the changes those faces go through in a short time. For example, a man sitting on a chair will let his mind get involved with the music in the air, and his eyes with a passing girl. Another will keep nodding off in the mid-afternoon heat and let his glass slowly empty onto the grass as his arm gradually falls.

The photographs on these pages are of people doing things like that. Look at them closely: perhaps, with time, they'll become less and less like pictures and more and more like humans. ■

Photos and Text

by

Archer Mayor

more

164

A new symphony season

Sunday Rotp - Sept 19
Herald-Traveler

by Harry Neville

The end of the season at Tanglewood is normally a time at which critics feel free to pontificate about the past and future estates of the Boston Symphony. For that is the point at which announcements are generally made of the comings and goings of orchestral personnel, of programs for the coming season, and of attendance records for the summer season. All this information arrived on schedule this year, and yet the curious critic and would-be prognosticator was left without any very substantial basis for pontification.

Such considerations have not been known to deter critics, but speculators were left singularly empty-handed this year, and the reason for that was that the biggest news of the summer was the non-news. Most observers had expected the appointment of a new music director. To be quite a bit more specific, most observers had expected Colin Davis's appointment to that position. But the summer came and went, along with Davis's guest engagements at Tanglewood, and no announcement materialized.

Whether or not speculation about Davis is idle is something that few outsiders know for sure. In this crucially important matter the decision-makers at Symphony Hall are playing their cards very close to the chest. All that can be said is that if the trustees are in fact considering Davis for the position and if he is in fact available, then his choice would probably be the most generally satisfactory one possible. He is rapidly approaching the super-star category — important for the sale of recordings — and, more importantly, he is liked by the players, although it must be added that only God knows what will happen between an orchestra and its conductor once the honeymoon is over.

William Steinberg

There was indeed some tangible good news this summer. The players won a spectacular contractual pay increase ($50 weekly during the first year, $10 weekly during each of the two ensuing years), only to learn afterwards of the wage-freeze. Tanglewood attendance figures were up apporximately 8 per cent over the previous season's attendance for comparable events.

Attendance, of course, has little to do with anything but the incidence of good weather and stellar artists, and there was plenty of both this summer. Artistically, too, the musicians seemed to feel that this was a better than usual summer, and what mere critic would gainsay the musicians of the BSO?

There was also important news of comings and goings, and the most important news of this sort was of the retirement, after 25 years with the orchestra, of principal horn player James Stagliano. Stagliano has had an exceedingly distinguished career in Boston and with important orchestras in several other cities. Interestingly enough, the initial announcement of his departure came not from the BSO press office but from an outside news agency.

Coupled with it was the news (dare one call it a threat-) that he plans to write the definitive book on conductors. Nearly everyone who's ever left an orchestra has had the same idea, but no one has ever carried the plan through. One can only hope Stagliano delivers on his promise. Such a book — honestly written and with no holds barred — would be an immense service to the world of music, though I can't think of anything — the hardest cored pornography included — that would be more quickly banned in Boston.

Other departures are violinists Herman Silberman, John Korman and Christopher Kimber, cellist William Stokking and hornist Paul Keaney. New arrivals are violinists Darlene Gray, Harvey Seigel and Ronald Wilkison, cellist Jonathan Miller and trombonist Gordon Hallberg. Violist Yzhak Schotten will return to the orchestra after a season with the Japan Philharmonic as part of the exchange program with that orchestra, and violinist Hironaka Sugie returns to Japan after a year here on the same program.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Despite the loss of two horn players, only the principal player will be replaced since the section had one extra player to begin with. Stagliano's replacement has not yet been selected, but it is known that the trustees are out for "big bear," in a determined effort to improve the section. It is said that one of the world's greatest hornists was requested to audition for the position, but it is also reported that he declined the invitation.

As most subscribers know by this time, the Friday-Saturday series at Symphony Hall during the coming season has been reduced from 22 to 20 pairs of concerts, and the announced reason for the reduction was to provide greater programming flixibility. Some people greeted this news with skepticism when it was first announced, but the new series that has resulted from the change is certainly cause for rejoicing.

It is called "Spectrum Concerts" and it consists of two special series of three concerts each, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's associate conductor. To put it as simply as possible, the programming is one of the most refreshing things that has happened at Symphony Hall in a long, long time.

The first program, "A Multiples Concert," of each series takes place Oct. 8 and 9 and includes Mozart's "Notturno for Four Orchestras," K. 236, Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta," Steve Reich's "Four Organs," and Liszt's "Hexameron for Six Pianos and Orchestra." The second concert of both series, "A Stravinsky Retrospective," will be in two parts. Part I on Jan. 7 includes "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," "Introitus," "Requiem Canticles" and "Rite of Spring." Part II on Jan. 8 includes "Scenes de Ballet," the Violin Concerto and "Symphony of Psalms."

The third pair of concerts, March 31 and April 1, is entitled "Four Religious Ceremonies" and includes Bach's "Christ lag in Totesbanden," David del Tredici's "Pot-pourri," des Prez' "Deploration on the Death of Gehan Okeghem" and Messiaen's "Et Expecto Ressurectionem Mortuorum."

Presumably, Spectrum Concerts will have a special appeal for young concert-goers and for those who no longer respond to the standard concert repertory. It's something of an experiment, perhaps, but it seems an important step in the direction of recapturing disaffected audiences. The orchestra trustees are the object of lots of complaining about the very things are handled at Symphony Hall, and sometimes the complaining is justified.

In this instance, however, they've allowed something truly brilliant and imaginative to happen, something that speaks well for the future of the orchestra, and something for which they deserve to be congratulated — along with Michael Tilson Thomas, of course, whose idea it was to begin with and who is, perhaps, not quite so much in need of reassurance as the much maligned trustees.

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND